National Geographic Special examines plight of Gorilla

The gorilla, largest of the great apes, is quietly disappearing from the wild, but there is a dedicated group of conservationists, scientists, zookeepers and private citizens who are fighting to save this endangered animal. "National Geographic Special: Gorilla," encoring Wednesday, Aug. 10, at 8 p.m. on KET, is a film about the people who are devoting their lives to the perpetuation of the gorilla.

Worldwide, only a few hundred mountain gorillas and an estimated 10,000-20,000 lowland gorillas remain. National Geographic cameras traveled to England, Africa, Europe, and in the United States to discover the ongoing conservation efforts.

Among those featured in the hour-long documentary are John Aspinall, owner of the Howletes Zoo, a wildlife sanctuary for endangered species; Dr. Francine Patterson, a research psychologist who conducts experiments in ape language communication; Dr. Dian Fossey, a research scientist who lived among the mountain gorillas for more than a decade, and Dr. Warren Thomas, Director of the Los Angeles Zoo, who shares thought-provoking information about the plight gorillas face.

The "National Geographic Specials" are produced by the National Geographic Society and WQED, Pittsburgh.

Animals know how to keep cool

Climb a tree—flap your ears:

How do animals beat the heat?

By doing anything from wallowing in mud to climbing a tree, according to the June issue of Ranger Rick, the children's publication of the National Wildlife Federation.

When the temperature soars and the sun sizzles, here's how some animals keep their cool:

The white rhino wallows in mud until its body is coated, and then cools off as the water in the mud evaporates.

By climbing a tree, the brown bear cub is cooled by the passing breezes, which also blow away black flies and mosquitoes that add to the misery of summer's heat.

Snoozing on the beach in the hot sun, the elephant seal stays cool as it molts, or loses patches of hair and skin. It then protects and cools its tender new skin by flipping damp sand all over its body.

Almost like hibernating, Australia's cyclorana frog digs underground to escape the heat, wraps itself in a cellophane-like sac made of old skin, and stays there until cool rains fall — sometimes for more than a year.

Both the fennec fox and the elephant flap their huge ears to cool off. The bigger the ears, the more blood vessels there are lying close to the skin; heat from the warm blood flowing through these blood vessels then passes quickly from the animals body into the air.

The laughing gull pants like a dog and fluffs out its feathers to let its body heat escape.

Because the cougar hunts and eats in the cool of the night, he sleeps all day; the hotter it gets, the more his body stretches out, and the more he stretches, the more heat escapes from his body.

The ferruginous hawk protects its chicks by shading them in the nest with its own shadow while the other parent hunts for food.

The sand-diving lizard does just what its name implies: it dives into the sand and stays there, protected from the sun's rays, during the hottest part of the day.
