SPORTS REPORT

9-10 Year Old Division

body in Kentucky can better appreciate basketball than the bluegrass state basketball fan. With that in mind this week, some letters:

David Keger from Princeton: Bob "I recently read your observations about the Kentucky Indiana High School All-Star game (Rupp Arena, June 24), and more specifically the comparisons between Steve Alford and James Blackmon. I also attended the game that was played at Lexington, and was amazed to find out that my observations differed a great deal from yours, regarding the Alford-Blackmon comparison. It was my opinion that Blackmon excelled in the latter stages. However, this opinion does not mean that he is or will be a better player. The University of Kentucky has recruited several gifted athletes in the Dwight Anderson who were never able to harness their natural talent into becoming an all-around, gifted player.

Regarding the Alford-Blackmon comparison, I was particularly impressed by Alford's ability to play with his feet. I disagree with your statement about Alford's ability to play under control. He handled the ball superbly and showed tremendous poise to penetrate the Kentucky All-Star team defense. Additionally, you made no comment about the leadership skills that Blackmon and Alford possess. I saw Alford as being a better floor leader than Blackmon. Blackmon has a great deal of intelligence, and during the final few minutes of the Kentucky-Indiana All-Star game, he was the player who assumed the leadership role and the ball-handling duties.

Indeed, James Blackmon is a tremendous athlete and will be a valuable asset to the University of Kentucky program. However, I believe that Bobly might be able to recruit the player that will benefit his program more. Alford's leadership ability is an intangible item that will benefit the Indiana team immensely over the next four years. As a fan of the SEC, I am interested to compare Alford and Blackmon after the latter has completed four years of college. Then, maybe we can have a better comparison.

Comment Thank you for writing, David. It is nice to see that our assessments of the two players here are not as far apart as you might think.

However, I would add that the basis for my opinion that Blackmon is the "more valuable" player is reinforced by a number of other factors beyond his performance at Rupp Arena.

Central Michigan was ranked 25, last 4 and end zone season tickets ($64 each) are available for the seven Wildcat home games.
