Summer jobs for the young

Almost 6,000 summer jobs will be available to economically disadvantaged young people in 92 Kentucky counties, Human Resources Secretary Buddy Adams has announced.

The jobs are part of the federally-funded Summer Youth Employment Program under the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act.

The Department of Labor has allocated more than $12.6 million to Kentucky for the program," Adams said. Human Resources will administer more than $7.5 million of that total to fund 5,898 job slots in the 92-county balance of state CETA prime sponsor area.

The remaining funds have been allocated to the Bluegrass Employment and Training Program, the Louisville/Jefferson County Consortium and the Eastern Kentucky Concentrated Employment Program for summer youth employment programs in those areas.

Kentuckians who are 16 through 21 years old whose family incomes are at or below the federal poverty level are eligible for jobs under the program, Adams said. Participants may work a maximum of 320 hours, or about eight weeks, during the summer. They will be paid the federal minimum hourly wage.

The jobs include repair and maintenance at local public schools, painting and repainting publicly owned parks and recreational facilities, and work being at local health departments, libraries and public parks.

"In about 6,600 youth worked in the summer youth employment program in the balance of state area. "Through turnovers, we expect to serve about 8,000 young people under this program," Adams said.

Youth who are interested in the program should contact their local Department for Manpower Services offices.

Rains spell trouble for crops

Torrential rains that have victimized the state in recent weeks are making it impossible for Kentucky farmers to adhere to normal planting schedules.

Small grain crops already in the ground are facing problems, and most of the state's corn fields stand idle. The corn crop, expected to be about 900,000 acres, is in particular danger, says Dr. Morris Bitzer, Extension specialist at the University of Kentucky.

"The next 10 days to two weeks will be crucial," said the specialist. Statewide, less than 10 percent of the corn crop has been planted. Normally at this time of year, the figure is above 50 percent, said Bitzer.

For every day Past May 15, a corn crop suffers a one percent yield loss per day, according to the specialist. "After the 20th of May, you really take a loss," he added. Grain planted past June 10 may not mature before frost.

Bitzer suggests that farmers with no-till capability plant no-till corn since that method allows them to get into fields sooner than the conventional method. "Later planted corn does better no-till," he added.

Bitzer explains Extension will plant corn as late as they can because corn prices promise to be stronger than soybean prices. Farmers aren't hurrying on soybeans yet, although soybean planting normally is full force in the Purchase area by now, he said.

Fortunately, noted Bitzer, corn acreage would not be as great this year as it is because of the government's PIK program which has encouraged reduction by about 600,000 acres.

Although some growers managed to plant corn in early April, replanting may be necessary because of low soil temperatures. "Even if the weather gets dry, temperatures are supposed to remain cool," Bitzer said, adding that the lower temperatures mean slower growth for grains.

30 day forecast

Tom Priddy, Extension meteorologist at UK, says the 30-day outlook extending to mid-June doesn't offer a lot of hope for the needed warmth in soil temperatures. The outlook is not that positive for a dry spell, according to Priddy.

The 30-day forecast calls for near normal precipitation. And, Priddy says, "Even if we get normal, well-distributed rainfall, it still will be hard for farmers to catch up."

He explains that anytime soils are saturated, soil temperatures remain cool. Warmth is needed for germination to spread by water washing into plant beds. Angular leaf spot, a bacterial disease, is expected to increase rapidly due to extensive water soaking of leaf tissue.

Generally, peaches vary from complete loss to full crops. Early blooming apples, such as Red Delicious, were severely thinned. Strawberries were injured slightly. A lot of early broccoli and cauliflower was lost.

Five inches is normal for that city. Lexington recorded about six inches in the past because of the government's PIK program which has encouraged reduction by about 600,000 acres.

Heavy rains also mean more disease problems with vegetable and fruit crops. And growers face the same problem as corn producers — getting into the fields to plant. Dr. John Strang, Extension horticulturist, notes that early crops, such as corn, are the biggest money-makers for vegetable growers.

However, the heavy rainfall will not influence the state's fruit and vegetable crops as much as the late spring frost did. Strang notes that damage varied by crop, cultivar and location.

Generally, peaches vary from complete loss to full crops. Early blooming apples, such as Red Delicious, were severely thinned. Strawberries were injured slightly. A lot of early broccoli and cauliflower was lost.

Don't make pets of wildlife

This is the time of year when a camper, hiker or fisherman is most likely to encounter young animals in the woods. The first impulse in many instances, is a desire to "adopt" the baby skunk, raccoon, fawn or whatever.

But the best course of action, according to wildlife experts, is to leave baby animals, even those seemingly "orphaned," where they are.

Although this advice may at first glance seem hard hearted, it is actually kinder in the long run for both the animal and the humans involved.

In the first place, the baby animal may not be orphaned at all. A fawn, for example, that seems all alone in the big woods probably has an anxious mother waiting nearby, but she will not show herself while a human is in the vicinity.

The care and feeding of a young animal is demanding and complicated, and most of those taken from the wild will die because they are given the expert care that only a knowledgeable person can provide.

And if the animal does survive past infancy, other problems arise. Unlike dogs or cats, which have been domesticated for centuries, wild animals seldom lose their "wild" nature. An adult deer, particularly a buck, can be extremely dangerous, and a raccoon, even one raised in the house, starts thinking he can whip anybody in the family when he gets to weigh about 20 pounds — or he's right.

Wild animals raised in captivity can seldom be successfully returned to the wilds, presenting their owners with the problem of what to do with an unmanageable deer, fox, raccoon, skunk or deer. Often the animal must be destroyed, since it is almost impossible to get room to accept wild pets.

Then there's the problem of disease. Wild animals can carry and transmit to man several diseases, the most serious of which is rabies. Often, an animal which allows itself to be captured is diseased. Any animal which does not show a normal fear of man or displays signs of distress should be left strictly alone.

Skunks are particularly dangerous, since they can carry the rabies virus for six to eight months before symptoms appear. Even a skunk bought from a pet store and certified disease-free could develop rabies months after it is purchased.

Skunks and foxes probably represent the most common reservoirs for rabies in the wilds, although virtually all mammals are capable of carrying this disease and transmitting it to man. The danger of rabies, by itself, is reason enough to leave wildlife in the woods.

Finally, there's the legal aspect. To keep wildlife as pets, a permit from the Department of Fish and Wildlife Resources is required, and a permit will be granted only for those animals taken during the open season for that particular species.

Without a permit, the animal is subject to confiscation and the owner can be fined. A conservation officer, upon application for a permit, will check to see if the animal was obtained legally and if the facilities for keeping it are sanitary and of adequate size. The officer will also make periodic checks to make sure the animal is being well cared for.

So for both animals and people, the best course of action is to leave wildlife in the wilds. Although the impulse to adopt a wild creature can be great, it's better to enjoy birds and animals in their natural surroundings instead of subjecting both them and you to unnecessary hardships.

Farm accident statistics

Six Kentuckians died in farming accidents during the first three months of 1983, bringing to 39 the number of state residents who have perished in farm fatalities during the past three calendar quarters.

The grim statistics are reflected in the findings of a farm fatality survey conducted since last July 1 by the Kentucky Farm Bureau safety department.
