Tobacco in the 1990s

Is the program going up in smoke?

By Philip H. Brown

Economists taking part in an agricultural leaders conference in Lexington recently made some predictions about what the tobacco program of the 1990s will look like.

Dr. Robert L. Thompson, senior staff economist for food and agriculture on the President's Council of Economic Advisors, and Dr. Marvin Duncan, vice president and economist with the Federal Reserve Bank of Kansas City were among the nationally prominent economists who spoke during the conference.

While one of the economists predicted to be identified with specific predictions, the prevailing opinion was that tobacco is moving toward a free market.

"Many economists believe the tobacco program may disappear within the next five to 10 years," said Dr. Don Dierker, economic agricultural economist with the University of Kentucky College of Agriculture, and coordinator of the conference.

"TOBACCO in the 1990s may not be grown and marketed the same way many vegetable crops are now grown — on contract. The tobacco companies would contract with growers to buy an agreed upon amount of specified grade at a predetermined price. That's what some people believe may happen," Dierker said.

Thompson said the current tobacco price support program has hurt the American tobacco farmer's position in the world market.

"When the tobacco program began we were the leading tobacco exporter in the world, now we import about 30 percent of what we use," Thompson said.

When the government, in effect, buys a farmer's tobacco at a given price, $1.60 per pound for example, there is no incentive for the producer to export the tobacco at a price less than that. That leaves the export market open to producers in other countries who can get a crop to market for less than $1.60 a pound. That's not

When the tobacco program began we were the leading tobacco exporter in the world, now we import about 30 percent of what we use," Thompson said.

Services were Wednesday, August 1 at Mother-Grace Funeral Home by the Rev. Ronald Howwood. Burial in Carlisle Cemetery.

Palbearers were Robert Pumphrey, Sr., Brown and Edward Pumphrey, Joe Wilson, Ken Borders and Jack Gallego.

FB contest winners advance to District 9

Gina Gilbert and Helen Watkins were second contestants. Flann Bowers and youth contestants. Others competing were Thelma Wootley and Melba Harmon.

Winners in both categories will advance to Farm Bureau District 9 contests in Pendleton County this October.
