Nicholas biggest loser if Falmouth Dam is built

Nicholas County would be the biggest loser if the proposed Falmouth Dam is built. A total of 1,200 acres here would be covered by water, according to Tom Henley, Falmouth, Route 1, a longtime adversary of the dam. Falmouth Dam opponents and environmentalists feel we can't afford to lose much more."

He went on to say that "The Corps of Engineers has studied this project for 40 years and has spent a million dollars in tax money. They say it isn't feasible."

This project has encountered opposition for 30 years from farmers who would lose their land. The people of Falmouth want it for food control and a cleaner water supply," Henley said. The $10 million dam proposal was passed by the U.S. House of Representatives and now goes to the Senate where committee action is expected next April.

"That's why it is so important that people write to their senators and let them know how they feel if they want to stop the building of the dam," Henley told his audience.

Letters to Senators Lee Ingham and Wendell Ford may be addressed to the Dirksen Building, Washington, D.C. 20543.

"The task force's work is central to the improvement of the state's educational system," said Alvin McDonald, superintendent of public instruction.

A state education task force has proposed guidelines for the training of instructional leaders in public schools throughout Kentucky.

The guidelines, reviewed by the State Task Force on Implementing the Effective Instructional Leadership Act at its final meeting Aug. 11 in Frankfort will now be forwarded to the State Board of Education for approval.

Under a bill approved by the 1984 General Assembly, all public school administrators must take 42 hours of training every two years in administrative techniques and specific skills.

The legislation, Senate Bill 36, also called for creation of a task force made up of educators at the state and local levels to recommend guidelines for the training.

The proposed guidelines specify that required instruction must be conducted by an authorized trainer. The job of the task force has been to review guidelines under which the state board will approve training providers.

The legislation also calls for the evaluation of certified employees through a system to be developed by local school districts and approved by the State Board of Education.
