Sets attendance record

Several key issues in limbo

by Rep. Adrian Arnold

With four weeks remaining for the General Assembly to take floor action, several major issues are apparently still in limbo.

The governor's budget bill barely skidded into the filing basket under the wire, as the legal deadline for all bills to be filed in the House this session was last Friday.

Legislators are therefore just now getting a look at the governor's formal tax-increase measures and her education-reform package, although detailed briefings on those proposals have been provided them by the governor in recent weeks.

Aside from the wait-and-see attitude most lawmakers have taken on those proposals, several major bills moved through the legislative process last week.

House members approved legislation that would allow the state to deny a license to any long-term care facility that has not met minimum state standards of care in the preceding 12 months.

An attempt to lure new industry to the state — and thereby create new jobs — prompted the passage of legislation that would exempt the mining of certain minerals from the state's severance tax.

Although the measure passed the House, legislators from coal-mining areas of the state spoke vehemently on the floor against the bill, saying it was an insult to the state's sagging coal industry, which pays hefty severance taxes and already employs many thousands of Kentuckians.

House Bill 558, approved by House members, directs state-government agencies to set aside a certain percentage of their business for minority small-business owners. Supporters of the legislation said the passage of the measure could lead to a fuller participation of minority businesses in the public-sector market — ultimately resulting in an improved capability to survive in the overall marketplace and leading to a lessened dependency on government programs.

After hearing objections from members of the House Committee on Natural Resources — and after a special subcommittee drafted a substitute bill — lawmakers passed a bill that would regulate water-well drillers in Kentucky. The bill was proposed by the Kentucky Water Management Task Force as a means of gathering information on the state's underground water supplies, and of providing some safeguards to the thousands of rural Kentuckians who use well-water as their only water source.

Kentucky is one of the few states in the nation that does not have any statistics on the status of its underground water supplies. Several recent outbreaks of hepatitis, plus reports of polluted water supplies in some Eastern Kentucky communities, indicated a need for legislative action. The Water Management Task Force spent the entire interim studying the problem.

A bill strengthening Kentucky's child-support law was approved last week by members of the House Health and Welfare Committee.

The measure would allow the state to intercept income-tax refunds and withdraw additional money from the paychecks of people not paying adequate child support.

Provisions of the bill would allow the Human Resources Cabinet to trace child-support violators through regional field offices. Supporters of the legislation claim the program could be self-supporting after the initial start-up year.

SEN. HUDDLESTON OPENS CAMPAIGN FOR RE-ELECTION

Senator Walter (Dee) Huddleston opened his campaign for re-election to the United States Senate this week citing his experience as an investment for Kentucky.

"Kentuckians have invested in me by granting me two terms in the United States Senate. With the experience and seniority I have gained that investment will pay even greater dividends through a more effective and forceful voice for Kentucky," Huddleston said.

Huddleston is the ranking Democrat on the Senate Agriculture Committee.
