RED CLOVER LONGEVITY HOPE OF RESEARCHERS

Cheaper feed for farmers means cheaper food for consumers. Researchers at the University of Kentucky are working to make a popular cattle forage cheaper.

Dr. James H. Myers, along with Drs. Glenn B. Collins and Norman Taylor, are working to lower the costs beef and dairy producers pay to feed their livestock. The three UK researchers and Dr. Jude W. Grosser, a former UK graduate student now with the University of Florida, are trying to increase the yield of red clovers.

Red clovers are popular forages because they are high in protein and very digestible, Myers said. He added that they make their own nitrogen, so farmers do not have to buy nitrogen fertilizer when they use red clovers as forage.

Wild clover reseeds itself naturally about every 8-10 years. Myers and his colleagues are hoping that by finding wall-less cells of red clover (also known as protoplasts) with wall-less cells of wild clover, they'll get a red clover which will stay alive as long as wild clover.

The drawback to wild clover, however, is that it has more fiber and a lower yield than red clover. The researchers are hoping they'll be able to take the two different plants and make them into one plant that has only the best features of each. The plant that would result is called a hybrid.

An open letter to parents

ALICE McDONALD

Dear Parent:

Not long ago, the Louisville Courier-Journal ran a story about the coach of an outstanding American aglversity. This coach had just booted one of his best players off the team, because, he said, the player was not paying sufficient attention to his studies. The story went on to report that from time to time, the coach pointedly reminds his team that the game will end on graduation day.

That coach has his priorities just right. Whether it is college, or elementary and high school, young people go to school to learn. They must learn to read, write, spell, do mathematics, to inform themselves about history, civics and science. They go to school to train their minds so that they can attend higher education or obtain a good job and one day be able to support themselves and their families.

It takes a certain amount of time to accomplish that training. The six-hour day has been Kentucky state law for 20 years, and most of Kentucky's school districts work hard to protect those hours for instructing the children.

Some districts, however, have permitted a variety of extracurricular activities to cut down the time designated for teaching. Pep rallies, basketball practice, weeklong training trips, magic shows, money-raising events, and senior release programs have reduced the time spent on learning.

You, the taxpayers, support Kentucky's public schools to the tune of $1.3 billion a year. That money provides a full scholarship to every child to attend school six hours a day, 175 days a year, every year from the first through 12th grade.

This is your child's education, so these are very precious hours. If they are lost, your children will pay the price. They will pay it in lost opportunity, in skills not learned, in test scores that are not as good as they should have been, and ultimately, in earning power lost. Yet in some districts, the time for learning is frittered away, sometimes at the parents' urging.

Because state law calls for a six-hour school day, and because the State Board of Education feels so strongly about the importance of six hours of instruction every day, the state board has issued a new regulation to uphold the integrity of that learning time.

This regulation outlaws events and activities that are not related to instruction. Activities that can be conducted include:

(1) The courses listed in "The Program of Studies for Kentucky Schools, Grades K-12."

(2) Enrichment or experimental courses approved by the state board.

(3) Co-curricular activities such as club meetings and assemblies, as long as they are directly related to the instructional program and are scheduled so as to minimize absence from class.

(4) Homeroom in the morning and afternoon to check attendance for no longer than 20 minutes a day.

Under these criteria, a properly supervised study hall and physical education are both legitimate parts of the six-hour day. Practice for interscholastic sports is not, nor can it be made part of a physical education class.

Senior release programs are popular in many high schools. The State Board of Education has determined, however, that it does not have the authority to approve state payment for students who are not in attendance in class, even though they have been officially released from school.

Local schools are free to make the decision, however, that they cannot expect state payment as if the students were in class all the time. This same concept, moreover, applies to other activities such as class trips that are popular, and perhaps even traditional, but that are not instructionally related.

Such decisions will be made in the local districts, just as they have always been made in the local districts. In deciding, local school boards will apply the criteria of reasonable behavior outlined in the state board's regulation.

That regulation takes into account factors such as frequency, duration of the activity and the number of students involved. For its part, the state board will use the same criteria in evaluating local decisions on these activities.

Readers concerned about this issue should be interested and reassured to know that the Kentucky High School Athletic Association has gone on record as being opposed to member schools attending events on non-school days, but that some events, such as golf and tennis, present problems because they require the use of non-school facilities.

The state board and the association will discuss this problem in depth in November. Meanwhile, the KHSAA deserves Kentucky's commendation for its efforts to protect our young athletes' time for learning.

In closing, let me say that many of the things we want for our children and our schools cost money. Time costs money too, but it will not cost one cent more to use wisely the time we have already been given for the task of teaching and learning.

Six hours a day, 175 days a year, from the first through the 12th grade, is all the time our children have to prepare for the next great stage of their lives.

You, the parents, want the best for your children. For their sakes, educators ask your help in safeguarding their time for learning. Together, we will help our young people excel in their studies.
