

More comet commentary

The more I read about Halley's Comet the more fascinating it becomes. The approaching visit, in fact, is a real happening. As we get closer, it will appear near as well as those who viewed it in 1910. It's not just a comet, it's a comet that is expected to be a good one. It will pass as close as 10 million miles from the last time (13 million miles), this never happens again.

There are those experts who claim that the 1986 appearance will be a good one. It will pass as close as 10 million miles from the last time (13 million miles), this never happens again.

At least it will probably look like a small, dim, hazy patch, and may be seen in rural areas and suburban areas. The best time to see it will be in the early morning hours. It will be in the sky for about a month, and will be seen in the early morning hours. It will be in the sky for about a month, and will be seen in the early morning hours.

According to predictions, the comet will be easily visible using binoculars and at least barely visible to the naked eye. It will be in the sky for about a month, and will be seen in the early morning hours.

Science fiction writer Isaac Asimov, in a story in this month's National Geographic, put it this way: "For a really good look we will have to wait until the year 2061, but we will be able to hang on till then, and neither side will be able to do any more."

So much for Halley's comet. It is expected to be in the sky for about a month, and will be seen in the early morning hours.

At 100 miles down and we start thinking of charitable contributions to the cause. It will be in the sky for about a month, and will be seen in the early morning hours.
