Shades of the past

An item in the Mercury's Down Memory Lane column, dated May 31, 1960, noted that PFC Eugene H. Gates had received the Distinguished Service Cross for "extraordinary heroism in action" while serving with 7th Army, 45th Division in Germany during World War II.

Gene's sister, Mrs. Ella G. Ritchie, who lives on the Moorefield Road, remembers the original account in the paper, as well as letters to her in which he briefly described a fateful five days he and other members of Co. G, 157th Infantry Regiment spent trapped in the Siegfried Line town of Bundenthal, Germany.

The citation read, in part, "The town was subjected to intense artillery fire Gates, on two successive days, climbed into the loft of a roofless barn and knocked out enemy log emplacements from which the Germans were directing withering machine gun fire.

"He had three rifle-grenades and managed to knock out two German machine gun nests. When the besieged group was to be rescued Gates, although suffering from a bad case of trench feet, aided some of the wounded men back to the American lines.

"Private Gates' heroism and initiative reflect great credit on himself and his organization."

Mrs. Ritchie's letters from her late brother went into a bit more detail. Seems he and several other doughboys of Co. G marched into Bundenthal during the night of December 19. They found an abandoned house that contained nothing more than a jar of kraut, appropriately, two rabbits and a milk cow in a shed-like barn built onto the house.

The sole water supply was a well located in the middle of the town square. They discovered a rusty bucket and drew water when clouds passed over the moon. As their stay lengthened and the men became hungry, they killed and dressed the rabbits and cooked the meat for soup. Since Gene was the only farmer in the bunch, he was elected to milk the cow.

They ate the kraut with their fingers. Wrote Gene, "Sis, you know I don't like kraut but getting shot at on it when I was little, but boy, was that good!

Cooking the rabbits proved their undoing. Germans spotted the smoke from the fire and opened up. One bullet struck a buddy who fell dead in Gene's lap. He wrote that it was the first time he'd seen anyone die.

Another charge split Gene's boot from top to bottom. Mrs. Ritchie said Gene didn't say so, but she believes seeing his fallen friend motivated him to grab that rifle and fire those two grenades that wiped out the machine gun nests. They were then able to escape and rejoin their company.

Gene carried a wounded GI, piggie back, to safety, despite a severe case of trench feet, which landed him in a hospital just before Christmas, 1944, a Christmas he doubted he'd ever live long.

The condition of his feet kept Gene hospitalized until the following spring. It was while he was recuperating in England that the Nazi war criminal. He was one of several to be decorated, some being high-ranking officers. He thought he'd be the last to be pinned, but it turned out he was the first. When they came towards him he began shaking so hard "they could have heard a line if they had rolled a barrel between my legs," he wrote his sister.

He survived the war (and the medal ceremony) but was rendered sterile for life duty.

The 40th anniversary of the end of WWII this year is something a lot of memobies, good and bad. We're happy to pass them along.

The Christian attitude — Members of the Nicholas County Festival of Bluejackets, led by coaches Robbie Barr and Greg Letcher, are considering a local church service each Sunday, en masse. Last Sunday they visited the Carlisle United Methodist Church, their first of several scheduled appearances.

It's all part of Barr's promotion of the Fellowship of Christian Athletes chapter which he helped charter here last May. The program is open to athletes and coaches of all sports, and cheerleaders. They plan monthly meetings all during the school year.

As I understand it, one eager lineman, Robert (Sugar Bear) McCaffrey was quite intent on being on time last Sunday he arrived almost an hour ahead of the church service. In a football game he'd probably be

Little League, 4-H leaders praised

To The Carlisle Mercury:

Enclosed you will find a check for the renewal of my subscription to the greatest paper in the world.

I have been in Texas for four years and I look forward to The Mercury every week. I have been able to keep up with the many friends that I left behind in Carlisle.

I really enjoy reading about the Little League programs and 4-H. I am really proud of all the coaches and leaders that still believe that a little effort on their part will make a better future for all of us through our young people.

Many of the young folks have grown up since I left and now they are the leaders of today, teaching the leaders of tomorrow.

Keep up the good work Carlisle, we transplanted Texans are watching you.

Yours truly,

Looks forward to Thursday

To The Carlisle Mercury:

Please renew my subscription for the Carlisle Mercury for the coming year. Since we moved to Lexington we find that Thursday is the best day of the week because it is Mercury day. We look forward to getting the hometown news.

Thank you.

The sun is setting...

on shadetree mechanics and reasonable-priced auto parts

The dashboards of today's cars, if you haven't noticed, look like cockpits in a night fighter jet poised on the Distant Early Warning line.

The gauges have been replaced by glowing digital readouts or bar graphs that only a computer expert understands. The numbers or bars are constantly changing, making it even more confusing to the average motorist.

David Mannweiler was commenting on this futuristic change. "I have talked to a lot of car designers in the last couple of weeks. They've been real quick to point out the pretty lights in those computer-age readouts on the dashboard.

"But, by a strange oversight, not one of them has mentioned something I learned from an article in Consumer Digest."

What he learned was the standard old fuel gauge — the one that reads "E" for empty on one side and "F" for full on the other side — costs as little as $25, the magazine noted.

"But a computer-controlled fuel gauge on a digital-readout dashboard can cost as much as $1,200 or more to replace.

"Then I found the part about the carburetor.

"A replacement carburetor for a 1979 pre-computerized-model V-8 costs $448, the magazine said.

"But a carburetor for a 1982 computer-controlled V-8 engine costs $1,011 to replace. A thousand bucks. For a carburetor."

"That sounds about right," said Jim Jackson, director of Lincoln Technical Institute in Indianapolis.

"We have to rewrite our auto maintenance curriculum virtually every year as cars change. Most car dealers in Indianapolis won't hire a mechanic who doesn't have trade school training.

"Unless an individual is a self-study person, he can't prepare himself for the field today.

"Even grease jobs are complicated now. There are different kinds of lubricants for different areas, and different pressure to inject it with, using different apparatuses. If you use the wrong lube in the wrong place, you can ruin a bearing or a sleeve or a piston.

"It all started when auto manufacturers began putting little black boxes under the hood or fender and when something went wrong with the car, the mechanic would simply rear back and claim all the trouble was in the little black box.

And all those sophisticated baggies will be made by robots in the future, according to Richard Shell, a University of Cincinnati industrial engineering prof, who says by 1995 there may be no hourly workers anywhere. Said Shell, "The year 2000 automobile may not be touched by human hands at all."

I must be way ahead of the times. I could swear every car I ever bought could not have been made by human hands.

"We adopted a cocker spaniel," Arthur Hoppe's neighbor, Fred was saying. "But we got him from his mother when he was only six weeks old. So it's just like having our own."

"What's his name?" Arthur asked.

"Fred Junior," said Fred. "Felicia thinks he has my eyes. And talk about precocious! The little fellow not only can walk at two months, but he bounds all over the house. And smart? He already knows his Mommy and his Daddy."

"That's great, Fred," said Arthur.

"I don't suppose you gave any thought to having a baby sister?"

"Yes," said Fred, "for about five seconds."

"I'm sure you're doing the right thing," Arthur said. "My dear wife, Glynda, has always wanted a puppy. But they're so much trouble — housebreaking them and all."

"Yes, Felicia was worried about that too," he said, "but I pointed out that you can housebreak a cocker spaniel in a couple of months at most. And that sure beats two years of diapers."

"Maybe so," Arthur said. "But there's also shots and vets' bills and..."

"Actually, that was the clincher," he said. "Fifty bucks for shots and a trip to the vet every couple of years. Now there are different kinds of lubricants for different areas, and different pressure to inject it with, using different apparatuses. If you use the wrong lube in the wrong place, you can ruin a bearing or a sleeve or a piston.

"I started when auto manufacturers began putting little black boxes under the hood or fender and when something went wrong with the car, the mechanic would simply rear back and claim all the trouble was in the little black box.

"And all those sophisticated baggies will be made by robots in the future, according to Richard Shell, a University of Cincinnati industrial engineering prof, who says by 1995 there may be no hourly workers anywhere. Said Shell, "The year 2000 automobile may not be touched by human hands at all."

"Maybe we should have tried that on our son, Mordred," Arthur said.

"You don't have to help him with his homework or teach him how to tie his shoes," said Fred, still waxing enthusiastic about cocker spaniels. "When you go on a trip, you just stick him in a kennel. And no matter how much you yell at him or how coldly you ignore him, he'll always think you are the most marvelous human being in the whole wide world.

"Yes, but there are rewards for raising children that dog lovers will never know. For example, who will support you in your lonely old age?"

"He's Mordred going to be at that?"

After thinking this over for a full five seconds, Arthur told Fred he was surprised.

"You mean you're surprised that Felicia and I would choose a cocker spaniel over a kid?"

"No," said Arthur, "I'm surprised the human species ever survived the domestication of the dog."

Yakov Smirnoff, who earned his living as a comedian in the Soviet Union, says he got out of the country in a very unusual way — alive.

"What surprises me," he said, "is that Americans don't know there are comics in Russia. They're there. They're dead, but they're there."

Smirnoff said he hadn't always planned to be a comic, which is a rare job there. "My father wanted me to be what he was," said Smirnoff, "a suspect."

The basis of humor in the Soviet Union is "like it is in every country," said Smirnoff. "It's a defensive mechanism to deal with the adversities of life."

The fact that the average Soviet citizen lives in an apartment about 18 feet by 10 feet generates jokes suchas this one, now going the rounds in Moscow: An American is asked by a Russian, "How many rooms do you have in your apartment in the United States?" The American replies, "Seven: four bedrooms, a living room, dining room and den."

"How about you?" the American asks the Russian. "The same," replies the Russian. "Without walls."

A Russian asks a West European how many cars he has. "Three," replies the European. "One to drive to work, one to go see my mistress and one to travel abroad."

"And you?" the European asks.

"None," says the Russian. "When I go to work, I take the subway. If I want to see my mistress, I take a train. If I go abroad, the government gives me a tank."

"There's really not much on Soviet television," said Smirnoff. "There are only two channels to speak of. The first has propaganda. The second has a guy from the KGB who tells you to turn back to Channel One."

Onward, upward.

Nicholas unemployed rate jumps

Unemployment rates rose in Nicholas and 96 other Kentucky counties between June and July, reflecting the rise in the statewide rate, according to figures released by the Cabinet for Human Resources. Rates were lower in 19 counties and remained the same in five.

Sixty-six counties reported rates above 10.0 percent, compared to 51 in June and 10 in July 1984.

Compared to July 1984, rates were higher in 66 counties, lower in 51 and the same in three.

Nicholas County's unemployment was at 11.6 percent, up from 7.3 in June.

The increase in Kentucky's jobless rate between June and July was caused by a drop in agricultural jobs and a decrease in the number of hourly employees who work for schools and colleges during the summer and the summer vacation period at manufacturing plants.

Big-hearted approach — Two recent, gestures — the Lions Club donation of a $1,000 multi-purpose cot to the local ambulance service, and the Rotary Club's establishment of a $500 college scholarship to be given annually to a NCHS senior — are shining examples of why Carlisle has been known through the years as "The Little Town With a Big Heart."

The cot is in memory of Doc Bradshaw, who could have used it during his numerous trips to and from Carlisle to Lexington hospitals, where he often had to wait for long periods or be transferred, at some discomfort, to a hospital wheelchair.

The scholarship fund will be a living and ongoing memorial to one of the community's best known and beloved citizens, Charlie Cox. Grateful students yet unborn, will benefit from the annual grants. It will take a lot of individual contributions to get the fund started. All donations are tax deductible, so make out your check while it's on your mind. I think Charlie would have been very pleased to have such a tribute be in the form of a scholarship to a student who might not otherwise be able to further his or her education.

Well done, Lions and Rotarians.

Speaking of the Lions Club, their big horse show comes off Saturday at the East End Park. Proceeds from the dirt-cheap $1 admission price go to such worthwhile things as the ambulance service cot and eye glasses program. A lot of family-type fun for very little money...surely the best entertainment value of the year.

Plans backfire — The most disappointed people in town this week have to be Charlotte Hardin and Joe Jennings. And for good reason. They had arranged to have Charlie Flansell and members of the 1957 basketball team as special guests of the Nicholas County Alumni Association at the Sept. 13 NCHS-Fairview football game.

All systems were go until Monday night when Mrs. Finnell called to say Charlie would be unable to attend on that particular date. Maybe later.

The celebration will go on as planned, however, beginning with get-together at 4:30 p.m. and again after the game. Members of the team may still attend, but no Finnell.

Just goes to show you never to plan anything on Friday, the 13th.

Bye, bye, Barnes — Two businesses in the 100 block of West Main Street have closed in the past month. Last Friday was the final day of business at Bruce Barnes's Ky. Food Store, after 4½ years of operation. A business climate less than what he'd hoped for forced Bruce to sell his grocery stock in the building that housed Neal's Square Deal Grocery for seven years.

He and his wife Regina, son Paris, 10 and daughter, Sabrina, 7, plan to maintain their home here at least until he weighs several options for the future.

B&M Restaurant, next door to Barnes, closed not too long after it opened. There are those who say the name B&M was too much of an obstacle to overcome. A few more customers would have helped.
