Judge overrules Fryman's motion

The following order, dated Sept. 10 and signed by Nicholas Circuit Judge Jack Arnold, was entered Sept. 11 by Circuit Clerk Sally Watkins:

The contestee, Clay Fryman, having moved this Court pursuant to CR 59.05 to set aside this Court's judgment entered on August 22, 1985, the parties having been heard, and the Court being otherwise sufficiently advised, said motion shall be and hereby is overruled, it appearing of record that the movant is not a party and was not a party to the appeal.

The order followed a Sept. 3 hearing at which time Charles T. Walters, attorney for Fryman, had asked the court to set aside the order and judgment entered August 22, 1985. Fryman stated that while he had been made a party to the action by an order dated Jan. 27, 1983 he was not made a party to the appeal prosecuted by the petitioners, Chester A. Bretz, et al.

The order stemmed from court action surrounding the sale of alcoholic beverages in the Myers precinct which Judge Arnold recently declared null and void.

New fescue variety acceptance is high

Demand for the new, low-endophyte fescue Johnstone has been unusually high. Don Miles, Extension seed specialist in the University of Kentucky College of Agriculture, said demand is likely to exceed supply this year.

"Because of the impact of what Johnstone could do for the beef industry in particular, the demand is stronger than usual for the introduction of a new variety," Miles said.

Earlier projections of the size of this year's supply have not been met, but Kentucky will get the lion's share. There will be an estimated 450,000 pounds of Johnstone seed available this year in the 16-state region for which it is suitable. Kentucky will get 100,000 to 150,000 pounds of that.

Johnstone was developed at the University of Kentucky, which retains exclusive rights to the variety. UK has granted the right to produce and market Johnstone seed to Kentucky for Progress, a cooperative of Kentucky seed producers formed for the specific purpose of introducing Johnstone seed. The university receives a royalty from the sales of the seed which will be used for further research.

Miles said the seed is being grown in Oregon but is being labeled according to standards of the Kentucky Seed Improvement Association. All Johnstone seed is certified seed. Certification guarantees that the seed is at least 98.5 percent genetically pure. Thus, the farmer is assured of getting not just fescue, but low-endophyte Johnstone fescue. KSIA standards also require label information regarding germination rate, mechanical purity and disease resistance.

Although demand for Johnstone seed is expected to exceed the supply this year, Kentucky for Progress officials are hoping to multiply the supply by next year, providing enough to go around in Kentucky and the 15 other states eager to introduce the performance booster to their pastures.

Profit results mixed for vegetable growers

Kentucky farmers, many growing vegetables for the first time this year, achieved mixed results this growing season.

Harold Love, Extension marketing specialist in the University of Kentucky College of Agriculture, said several producers had lost out as a matter of timing.

"Poor timing removed the profit for many farmers. Failure to get their crops in on time ran their harvest into the homegrown season when demand and prices drop," Love said.

Hopkins asks no-net-cost funds use

U.S. Rep. Larry J. Hopkins, (R-6th), ranking member on the House Tobacco and Peanuts Subcommittee, is urging grower representatives to present the U.S. Department of Agriculture an administrative plan using no-net-cost funds to lower the price of burley.

"Probabilities multiply each day that Congress will be unable to agree on and pass remedial tobacco legislation prior to the November opening of the burley auction sales.

"It is my opinion that unless we act immediately to negotiate an administrative agreement with USDA, this season's crop will be virtually unmarketable at $1.78 per pound, particularly in view of the unprecedented disparity which now exists between burley and flue-cured prices," Hopkins said in a letter to burley growers.

In July, USDA approved a reduction in the price of flue-cured tobacco down to $1.40 a pound. Burley state delegations have been working on tobacco legislation since the first of the year, but the bill may not make it to a vote before the burley markets open in November. Administrative relief by USDA would allow the price to be altered without legislation.

Hopkins has received assurance from Secretary Block that the department will consider a proposal from the burley industry reducing the 1985 support price by administrative action.

AT A MEETING of the executive committee of the Council for Burley Tobacco Friday, Hopkins urged the members to discuss options and make a proposal to the Burley Tobacco Cooperative Association for approval by Secretary Block. In a letter to G.B. Midden, president of the Council for Burley Tobacco, Hopkins suggested some guidelines on how the proposal might be formulated. They included:

(1) The full 30-cent assessment for 1985 might be utilized to reduce the average support price to $1.40 when the markets open in November.

(2) Support price reduction should be contingent upon purchases of a specified amount of tobacco off the auction floor and might include commitments to purchase a specified amount of 1983 pool stocks.

(3) 1983 pool stocks could be discounted by the $102 million balance currently in the No Net Cost account.

(4) Purchases of 1983 stocks should entitle buyers to pre-1982 flue-cured stocks at 90 percent discount.

"We cannot afford to leave the fate of the tobacco program and our growers to the uncertainty of the legislative calendar. The ball — and the opportunity — is in our court. I look to you and your fellow burley leaders for the formulation of a specific plan which we can take to the Secretary as soon as possible to insure the orderly and beneficial continuation of the federal tobacco program," Hopkins said.

Fall foliage hotline to open

For the first time, travelers to Kentucky this fall will be able to get up-to-date information on the state's beautiful fall foliage, Tourism Secretary Wendell Combs announced.

Through a cabinet program called "ColorFALL Kentucky," a visitor will be able to call a toll-free phone number, 1-800-225-8747, to obtain a region-by-region summary of foliage conditions. The information will be updated weekly. The program starts Sept. 24 unless leaf conditions dictate an earlier or later start.

Combs said ColorFALL Kentucky will be similar to established fall foliage programs in other states.

"The fall-foliage season is very important to the tourism economies of New Hampshire, Vermont and other states," Combs said. "We believe there is excellent potential for growth for fall-foliage sightseeing in Kentucky."

ColorFALL Kentucky is a cooperative effort of the Office of the Secretary, the Department of Travel Department, and the Department of Parks. Under the program, state park naturalists at eight reporting stations throughout the state will report to the Department of Parks central office the progress of leaf color changes.

The information will be ejected on a map and also reported in an accompanying news release. The weekly map and release will be sent to TV weathercasters at 25 stations in Kentucky and surrounding states. More than 300 newspapers and radio stations in the region will also receive the map and release.

Department of Travel Development telephone operators will be provided the map each Tuesday. Using this accurate information, the operators will be able to advise would-be travelers calling on the "Kentucky Color Connection" phone line about regions where leaf colors are peaking.
