UK breakthrough in cattle production

The University of Kentucky College of Agriculture may earn $250 million in the next 10 years from its development of a process that allows farmers to decide the sex of cattle through artificial insemination.

Genetic research at UK has unlocked the secret of predetermining the gender of livestock by sexing semen, a potentially limitless breakthrough in the field of cattle production. The announcement was made by IGT Laboratories Inc. of Winchester, the Kentucky agricultural research firm which has purchased the patent rights to the process. Sexed semen has been trademarked as IGT Sex-Split.

The announcement was made by Dr. Harvey Oury, president of IGT Laboratories Inc., who also states that IGT Laboratories has exclusive worldwide license to use, manufacture and market the semen-sexing process.

"Sex-Split semen will produce 50 percent more females than males in cattle," Dr. Oury said, pointing out that the normal male-to-female ratio is half and half. The male-to-female ratio in Sex-Split is 74 percent females to 25.6 percent males, creating a tremendous economic advantage for the dairy and beef producer.

"Genetically speaking," Dr. Oury continued, "the economic benefits created by this breakthrough lie in the production of a greater number of more valuable female animals in six to eight years than it has normally taken 20 or more years to develop. We believe that the advantage to cattle producers will be on the order of 300 to 600 percent on their investment."

In addition, the process can be reversed to increase the chances of a male birth. That would be attractive to beef producers seeking to improve their herds, officials said.

The Sex-Split procedure was developed by two UK researchers, Dr. Panayiotis M. Zavos and Dr. Karl A. Dawson. The UK Animal Sciences Department team was led by Dr. Zavos, an internationally recognized researcher in the area of male reproductive physiology and the principal inventor of the IGT Sex-Split semen-sexing process. Dr. Dawson is a specialist in microbiology and immunology.

Kentucky Agriculture Commissioner David E. Boswell expressed high praise for IGT and the UK researchers. "The IGT Sex-Split process will trigger increased commerce and economic benefits for the beef and dairy industries in the United States in the many millions of dollars.

"And this technology will be extremely valuable to beef and dairy farmers in the world's developing nations, eager to build and improve their herds," Commissioner Boswell continued.

Conservation tillage practices

by Curtis Rosser

Adaptable...flexible...customized — no matter what they call conservation tillage, there is a system for you. With the different systems available, you are not required to use just one general practice to keep 30 percent of the soil surface covered with residue after planting. That's what conservation tillage is all about...keeping the ground covered with crop residue.

When looking at practices available, consider how serious erosion is affecting your soil's productivity, which system fits into your conservation plan, and what local equipment is available and being used, suggests District Conservationist Curtis Rosser of U.S. Department of Agriculture's Soil Conservation Service. Then look at the pros and cons of the systems available: no-till, ridge-till, strip-till, mulch-till, or other minimum tillage practices.

No-till: With no-till, the soil is left undisturbed. Seeds are planted in a narrow seedbed about one to three inches wide. Weed control is accomplished primarily with herbicides.

Ridge-till: With ridge-till, the soil also is left undisturbed. Crops are planted on ridges usually four to six inches higher than the row middles. A combination of herbicides and cultivation is used for weed control. Cultivation is also used to rebuild the ridges.

Strip-till: With strip-till, the soil is left undisturbed. About a third of the soil surface is tilled at planting time. The seedbed is made in the row by a roto-tiller, in-row chisel, or row cleaner. Weeds are controlled with herbicides and some cultivation.

Mulch-till: With the mulch-till method of conservation tillage, the total soil surface is disturbed by tillage before planting. Such tillage tools as chisels, field cultivators, discs or sweeps are used. Weed control is with herbicides and some cultivation.

Others: Generally, conservation tillage includes any tillage and planting system where 30 percent or more of the soil is covered by crop residue after planting. The form of conservation tillage used depends on the site, local conditions and a grower's needs.
