Tillage helps crop yields, saves soil
by Curtis Hooser
How does conservation tillage affect crop yield?
"As a general rule, we have seen an increase in yields with conservation tillage in Nicholas County," according to Curtis Hooser, District Conservationist, U.S. Department of Agriculture, Soil Conservation Service. Corn has shown a marked increase especially when planted no-till instead of with conventional methods.

Conservation tillage systems leave a large amount of residue that help trap moisture in the soil. This is where we see our greatest increase in crop yield, Hooser said. Crop yields vary with the conservation tillage systems just as they do under conventional tillage. Factors include rainfall, kind of soil, fertilizer, pests and climate all contribute to yield increases or decreases. Any one factor during a crop year can have a significant impact for better or worse.

Steve Vico, who farms near Morefield, has had good success with conservation tillage. "We switched to no-till and have seen an increase in yields ever since," Vico said. "The bottom line for us is we are making more money and at the same time saving soil using conservation tillage. We are sold on it and recommend it for anyone willing to try it."

Over 20 percent of American farmers are using some form of conservation tillage now and the U.S. Department of Agriculture predicts that by the year 2000 over 80 percent will be using some form of conservation tillage.
