Breakthrough in tobacco housing ... that's if you've got the money

Engineers at the University of Kentucky have designed and built two tobacco harvesting machines that will save farmers time, money and thousands of repetitions of bending to cut a stalk, and bending to pick up a tobacco stick.

The 39-foot-long, 14,000-pound machine picks up the stalks with fingers installed at ground level. It is a special 30 acre tobacco packer.
