Letters from our readers

To The Carlisle Mercury:

First I would like to ask a very pertinent question for the people of Carlisle and Nicholas County.

Just who does the hospital administrator and board of directors want for patients at the Nicholas County Hospital?

Now to explain. Just a few months ago I read an article in the Mercury stating that our hospital would not participate in a program guaranteeing our local underprivileged people health care at the hospital. I believe there were only seven hospitals in the entire state of Kentucky who refused this program.

Now I read where these same people say no insurance is acceptable for payment except Blue Cross and Blue Shield! That sure is strange because Blue Cross may be big in medical coverage but they sure are not the only company who pays their claims.

I would hope the people of Carlisle and Nicholas County would make a point to see or call Mr. Smoot, Judge/Executive, and all the magistrates about this matter. After all, the local hospital is heavily subsidized with our tax dollars.

The hospital should be open for everyone to use regardless of what insurance you have or how much cash you have on deposit.

Surely no one wants our hospital to take on a country club image.

By the way, I have coverage by Blue Cross and Blue Shield so this is no personal vendetta against Blue Cross and Blue Shield.

To The Carlisle Mercury:

There is apparently much confusion and rumors concerning the new Nicholas County Hospital policy on insurance coverage of routine out-patient procedures. Hopefully this letter can clarify the situation. This policy is, as printed in the Mercury:

Effective Monday, February 3, 1986, all routine out-patient services provided at Nicholas County Hospital will be on a cash basis only, except for persons with Medicare, Medicaid or Blue Cross insurance coverage. Other insurance claims will be billed for the patient's convenience but not accepted for payment.

Routine out-patient procedure is defined as any non-emergency procedure, (lab test, x-ray, etc.) that is done on a patient who has not been admitted into the hospital for overnight care.

The reasons that the policy was established are as follows:

A). With some insurance policies, it is unknown at the time of service by both the hospital and the patient, the exact coverage of that policy.

B). In many instances, it is unknown, by the hospital or the patient, if the charge will be paid or should go to the completion of a deductible.

C). Many policies call for the payment to be made directly to the insured (the patient) which causes further delay and, at times, time consuming collection efforts.

Nicholas County Hospital will accept Medicaid, Medicare and/or Blue Cross on routine out-patient procedures. This is because our contracts with the state and federal government to provide Medicaid and Medicare services stipulates this, as does our provider agreement with Blue Cross of Kentucky. We have no obligation to file any other insurance. However, as a service to our patients we do file all insurance claims. When payment from insurance is sent to the hospital, we will immediately refund any amount due to the individual.

We hope that this clears up any confusion on the policy. We are, as always, striving to provide quality care and service to our patients, and continue this tradition.

Sincerely,
Robert W. Hester, Jr.
Administrator

To The Carlisle Mercury:

My husband and I would like to urge all eligible voters to vote yes or no concerning the sale of alcoholic beverages in our community.

It also concerns us that anyone would have the misconception that the sale of alcoholic beverages would promote economic growth. Drive through Newport if you want to see how alcohol can consume a community. I certainly would not want to live there nor put my factory in that environment. Mr. Toyoda located his plant in Georgetown and it's dry.

Beer signs hanging on every other store front makes a statement about the community. Our community has many families who have moved here because of the peaceful atmosphere yet continue to work in Paris and Lexington.

We hope this election will be like the recent Grant County election, in which all precincts voted dry.

Most of all, we want EVERYONE to vote.

Thank You,
Carolyn and Charles Pope

To The Carlisle Mercury:

National Vocational Education Week is scheduled for the week of Feb. 9-15. We here at the Harrison County Area Vocational Education Center in Cynthiana have scheduled various activities throughout the week that includes an open house on Wednesday, Feb. 12, during our regular school hours.

Since this school serves high school students only we are forcing two adult students from Nicholas County, I am issuing a number of staff special invitations to attend our open house at which time you may tour the school and programs as well as interview staff and students.

Students from our area high school district attend this school between the hours of 8 and 11:28 a.m.

It is my pleasure to extend to you this special invitation to attend the open house at your local Vocational Area Center.

Cordially yours,
James K. Plummer Sr.

To The Carlisle Mercury:

As another Local Option Election comes before the county this week, I urge you to vote yes and to vote NO to the sale of liquor in our area. To fail to vote is to vote "Yes", for the old

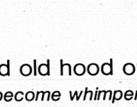
have become whimpering little blobs



You're going down the interstate on a snowy day minding your own business and a big semi rig bears down on you from the rear. It is bellowing like a bull and spouting snow and water and slush like a whale blowing off and creating a draft that makes you try to cower over to the shoulder and hide.

This happened to Momma the other day. This time monster roared past her, snorting and throwing ice in every direction. And it so happened that a piece of that ice broke off the flimsy hood ornament on our station wagon.

Now, Lee Iacocca, who says, "We don't want to be the biggest, only the best," wasn't talking about his hood ornaments. This drab little thing that resembles a frosted monocle sticks up there like an afterthought on this great Chrysler machine and does absolutely nothing for its owner, the car manufacturer or even the birds that might fly over and use it for target practice.

Whatever happened to those great traditional hood ornaments?

When this accident happened, I saw it as a great chance to finally get something with character and meaning out front.

"Let's get a casting made of our family crest and put it on the hood," I said to Momma as I swept the remains of piece and it would give me something interesting to look at driving down the road."

"Forget it," she said. No sense of imagination.

Our family crest, according to one of those cheap crest books sold in gift outfits that advertise in the sleazy tabloids is a well-endowed mermaid that puts up a great fight, resembling one of the carvings that used to be used to decorate the bow of tall ships at sea.

Some of us can remember when these hood cappers were called floor runners, and because they adorned the tops of radiator caps. Some even had thermometers built into them, so you could read the temperature of your radiator water as you drove down the road. Now the radiator of your car is likely to be anywhere, even in the rear end, shooting that idea all to pieces.

Seems to me as much time as we spend looking down the hood of our car, we should have something better in our view than a dinky little blob of pot metal. Some of the manufacturers simply put nothing out there; you peer down a bare hood to watch the road. Dullsville.

Car makers are passing up a good thing without knowing it. Some people buy cars for the hood ornaments, and everyone knows that a real macho up-front decoration makes your car run better, like a good wash job.

Even the expensive European machines have week hood pieces. Indiana Jones found this out when he was hanging on the front of that Nazi Mercedes on the way to the Lost Ark and the thing broke off in his hand.

All the cars used to have great emblems. Indians, swans and eagles stood out there proudly. And no one would buy a used car then if the hood ornament was missing, no matter about new tires and an overhauled engine.

Some trucks still have them. Bulldogs and rams and the like. It's their source of strength in climbing mountains or chasing cats with empty little hood ornaments off the road.

We like Volvos and salute the Dagwood Bumstead of the 32 we used to find. Big deal.

And they are also insisting that labels on booze bottles tell you what you are drinking: corn, barley, yeast enzymes, a carbide, loco weed or whatever. Next thing you know they'll want us to print the labels that whiskey can be harmful to your health. Like duh! What you are drinking takes on the feeling of adventure out of it.

"There are several good reasons to adhere to metric sizes," an ATF man told grog makers when this all came about. "For one thing, it will mean a substantial reduction in the number of bottle sizes. This should be an aid to the consumer."

A lot he knows. It's hard to beat a half-gint bottle for fitting in your pocket when you are sneaking across a dry county.

There used to be 16 different sizes of wine bottles alone. This number was reduced to six in metric sizes, I'm told. By strange coincidence, there are exactly 16 different kinds of wines. And to unceremoniously reduce them to six is class discrimination at its worst and makes equal division of swigs from a jug of Sweet Lucy on a dark night impossible.

The withering-away Farm Belt is no exception. Here are a few of current rural jokes:

Two executives of a farm-implement manufacturer were chatting.

"Isn't it sad about Tom Shortsleeves?" one said, referring to one of the company's best salesman. "He died after a lingering illness."

What did he have?"

"Iowa."

Pick out what does not belong on the following list, and explain why. The items are: AIDS, herpes, double pneumonia, a farm in northern Missouri.

The answer is pneumonia, because you can get rid of it.

Those of us not overly blessed with smarts are reduced to blabbering idiots when we walk into a liquor store.

The illustrious Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, which I always thought was a coonhunters' club, finally got their way. They have taken good American whiskey and packaged it in strange European measures and liters, so our grandsons will start whirling even before our first drink.

Fifths, quarts, pints and half-pints have disappeared from the shelves of our favorite watering holes. Now all we can do is walk in and mumble something like, "Gimme a gint about yay high of that Old Possum drinking whiskey."

A liter is a quart with a head on it. It takes 32 ounces, instead of the 32 we used to find. Big deal.

And they are also insisting that labels on booze bottles tell you what you are drinking: corn, barley, yeast enzymes, a carbide, loco weed or whatever. Next thing you know they'll want us to print the labels that whiskey can be harmful to your health. Like duh! What you are drinking takes on the feeling of adventure out of it.

practically impossible.

As for the reason given for switching to metric measures to help distillers cut down on the many different sizes of jugs is a crock of mall. Whiskey makers would put their booze in paper bags if they could sell more of it that way.

Back in the 12th century, a dude bent an elbow, smacked his lips and wrote:

"Alcoholic beverages slaweth age, + strengtheneth youth, it helpeth digestion, it abandoneth melancholie, it relaseth the heart, it lighteneth the mind, it quickeneth the spirit, it keepeth and preserveth the head from whirling, the eyes from dazzling, the tongue from lisping, the mouth from snaffling, the teeth from chattering and the throat from rattling; it keepeth the stomach from wambling, the heart from swelling, the hands from shivering, the sinews from shrinking, the veins from crumbling, the bones from aching and the marrow from soaking."

I'd like to see a federal feather-merchant improve on that.

Onward, upward.

we'll turn the other cheek, sir!

Our daily reading of "Daily Word" admonishes somewhere to turn the other cheek and forgive, we hold no grudges, we know you can't please everyone, we've never tried.

Just like our good friend in Owensboro, Buddy Beers, says thank goodness you've gotten off your duff and gone back to work.

Frankly we've never stopped working, maybe that's our trouble.

Legislative Week in Review

by Adrian Arnold

The Kentucky General Assembly last week entered its second month, haunted by the new and disquieting specter of severe budget cuts at the federal level — cuts that could ultimately have a profound effect on the state's own budget.

And House and Senate budget committees continue their study of executive-branch spending requests, the dire warnings of hard times coming promise to give new urgency to those deliberations.

The bad news — not altogether unexpected — came at mid-week, when President Reagan submitted to Congress his proposed 1987 budget. The president's plan foresees heavy cuts in domestic spending, including the revenue-sharing dollars so many local governments rely on to fund essential services.

Other programs important to Kentucky face deep cuts — or even elimination — as well. They include mine-safety research, agricultural extension services, education assistance, urban transportation, legal aid and job training.

Of most immediate concern, however, would be cancellation of the final quarterly revenue-sharing payment to local governments. The program had already been scheduled for extinction when the last quarter of the federal fiscal year ends Sept. 30, but the president's

SMALL BUSINESS: NATION'S BACKBONE

The history of Kentucky, and the nation, is one of farmers, manufacturers and merchants working together for a better society.

No matter what its present size, chances are that an enterprise traces its roots to an entrepreneur -- a person with a new idea who takes a risk in the hope of making a profit.

Our prosperous society was developed through individual initiative, a competitive spirit, and an enormous pride in our steady achievements. Too often, in this era of multi-national conglomerates, we overlook the backbone of our free enterprise system -- small business.

Our nation has experienced three recessions in the past 10 years. And in each of these, it was small business which created the majority of new jobs.

I believe small businesses are the foundation for economic growth of the future. In Kentucky 97 percent of the state's 61,000 businesses have fewer than 100 employees. Also, of 119 new industries announced in 1985, 107 employ fewer than 100 workers. These new industries, along with business expansions and new support industries brought about 22,000 new jobs to the Commonwealth last year.

It is the duty of government to make it possible for the entrepreneur to have every opportunity to compete fairly in the marketplace. And it is government's responsibility to try to maintain an economic environment that poses the least possible risk for research, development and marketing of products.

Today there are many obstacles facing entrepreneurs in our nation. They are impeded in attempts to compete in the world marketplace due to unfair trade policies of other nations. Plus, in the long term, our enormous federal budget deficit threatens to bring renewed inflation and high interest rates that will threaten these businesses.

Issues affecting small businesses, such as the federal budget deficit, taxation, product liability, and international trade, are to be discussed in a Feb. 25 meeting in Louisville.

The meeting, at the Hyatt Regency Louisville, is being held as part of the White House Conference on Small Business. Anyone whose business employs under 500 people may attend at cost of $35 which includes registration and meals. A registration form can be obtained by calling the White House Conference on Small Business, (202) 653-9550.

—HOMESTEAD—

Property owners reaching the age of 65 during the year of 1986 must apply for the Homestead Exemption by March 1, 1986 at the P.V.A. office.

Joe Frank Conley, Carlisle's youngest attorney, won his first criminal case in circuit court last Thursday when he defended Marion Bowman, charged with cutting and wounding David Barnett. Young Conley handled the case like a veteran. He is the son of Mr. and Mrs. William Conley and is associated with his father in the practice of law.

Jim Will Martin, former tax commissioner of Nicholas County who resigned some weeks ago after serving 14 years in that office, left Sunday for Washington, where he will join other Federal appointees to take the week of instruction and then will be assigned his territory. Mr. Martin has been given a position as inspector in one of the departments of the Treasury Department.

The WPA was in force ago set aside federal funds for the construction and equipment of a community playground and athletic field on the Lambert property on the eastern side of the East Union Road. Many delays have been encountered but Wednesday a start was made for the ground and it seems that the work under government supervision will start in the very near future.

In reviewing the Future Farmer projects for the past year, it was found that Eugene Caswell has produced 2,110 pounds of pork in six months, the total income of which was $234.77. The total cost was $87.34, leaving a labor income of $147.25.

Dr. E.A. Campbell sold Tuesday to Ed and Hugh Hunter his home and farm on the Carlisle Road, about a mile and a half from Carlisle, at a private price. Possession will be given March 1. Dr. Campbell and family have leased the residence of T.S. Riley on Locust Street and will move to the property in a few days.

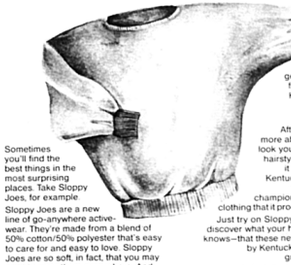
Ask your hairstylist to show you
THE LATEST FASHION FROM PARIS



Sometimes you'll find the best things in the most surprising places. Take Sloppy Joes, for example

Sloppy Joes are a new line of go-anywhere active-wear. They're made from a blend of 50% cotton/50% polyester that's easy to care for and easy to love. Sloppy Joes are so soft, in fact, that you may want to wear them everywhere. And you can, because they feature a full flattering fit and come in a great selection of fashion colors.

There's only one way to buy Sloppy Joes, however, and that's through your hairstylist, who gets them straight from Paris—Paris, Kentucky, that is.

Surprised? You shouldn't be.

After all, who cares more about helping you look your best than your hairstylist? And doesn't it make sense that Kentucky can produce the same kind of championship qualities in clothing that it produces in horses?

Just try on Sloppy Joes and you'll discover what your hairstylist already knows—that these new leisure clothes by Kentucky Textiles feel as great as they look.

In fact, there's only one thing surprising about Sloppy Joes, and that's how affordably priced they are. Now doesn't that convince you that they're the neatest new idea in activewear anywhere?
