UK's burner exceeds expectations

University of Kentucky's "corncob burner," which is supposed to produce inexpensive energy to dry corn, is doing better than expected in its first year of actual on-the-farm testing.

According to Sam McNeill, an engineer with UK's College of Agriculture, the biomass burner produced enough energy to dry newly harvested corn at less than one-half the cost of burners fueled by the traditional propane gas. The burner is being tested on a working farm owned by Wayne McAtee in Trigg County.

That savings is especially significant considering the current low price of gas. As propane prices go up, as most economists figure they will, the possible savings from the biomass burner will increase.

Although the biomass burner was designed by the UK College of Agriculture to burn corncobs, McAtee used woodchips which were more readily available from a nearby lumberyard in his tests. McNeill said the farmer kept his own careful records to compare costs of the biomass burner with propane. Not only did he compare costs per bushel, he also recorded costs per "point" of moisture removed from the corn.

"First, he dried two batches of corn at the beginning of the season using propane gas," said McNeill. "He found his cost using the traditional fuel was seven-tenths of one cent per point of moisture removed. Since he wanted to dry his corn to remove 7 points of moisture, his per bushel cost was 4.9 cents per bushel."

McNeill added, "Using the wood chips, which have a market value of $18.50 per ton, his costs were three-tenths of a cent per point or 2.1 cents per bushel."

By using corncobs, which are free for the using, even more savings are possible, McNeill said. One third the cobs from an acre of corn can dry all the corn produced on that acre.

So why doesn't everyone run out and buy a biomass burner and use the corncobs?

The front end cost to purchase the burner is one reason. It costs about $12,000. Second, it is difficult to gather the corncobs at present. Harvesters which shell the corn in the field just spit the cobs out along with husks and other chaff. Manual labor to pick up cobs could be expensive.

Nevertheless, McNeill believes the biomass burner using corncobs as fuel is the way of the future and both obstacles can be overcome. Price will come down as the manufacturer which purchased the College of Agriculture's patent recovers its development costs, and the UK College of Agriculture's engineering department is already underway with a new project to develop an efficient and economical way to gather the cobs.
