Kentucky Afield

by Norm Minch

Although the ratio of hunters in the field versus the number of hunting accidents is minimal, the overwhelming majority of even these few accidents probably could have been avoided by practicing fundamental, elementary safety.

During the next several weeks, the number of hunters in the woods will reach its peak as the opening of gun season for deer approaches. The seasons for rabbit, quail, grouse, waterfowl, dove, squirrel, woodcock and snipe will also either be opening or reopening shortly after the gun deer season is complete.

More hunters afield will increase the possibility of hunting accidents, so hunters should review their safety habits while enjoying the sport during the height of the season.

THE INFORMATION in the hunting accident reports filed this year reveals some typical factors commonly found when hunting accidents occur. Hunters aware of the pitfalls and possible dangers associated with hunting will greatly reduce the chance of a preventable accident happening.

One notable item from the reports is that hunting accidents occurred with all types of shooting weapons, except muzzleloaders. However, this weapon also has show up on past accident reports. Accidents occurred while hunting a variety of game from deer to groundhog.

This illustrates no particular type of hunting is exempt from the possibility of serious injury, and every type of weapon is exactly that, a weapon, and should be treated as such.

ANOTHER INTERESTING item is that eight of the nine reported accidents reported happened within a fifty yard range, with only one happening at over 200 yards. This does not necessarily mean weapons are less dangerous at greater distances, but could indicate ignorance of cardinal safety habits of handling ammunition or negligence in basic judgement when hunting.

Carrying loaded firearms over fences, running with a firearm in hand, pointing a gun toward the body to check whether it's loaded and swinging on game with a shotgun while unaware of the positions of other hunters caused four of the accidents this year.

Each one is a violation of simple safety, and more than likely could have been avoided. Hunting is an active process of being constantly alert of both your own actions and the actions of those hunting with or near you.

TWO OTHER ACCIDENTS, one which included a fatal shooting of a man with a bow and arrow, were chalked up to a hunter mistaking a man for game. One victim was believed to be a deer, the other victim thought he a wild turkey. The bottom line is to positively identify the target. Bigiets, shot pellets and arrows are deaf. They do not respond to verbal commands such as stop, or come back.

By following a few simple "nevers," practically all of the few accidents that occur each year could be eliminated. Never assume a gun is loaded. Never point a gun towards anything you do not intend to shoot. Never shoot something you have not 100 percent positively identified, or towards an object you are the least bit unsure about what lies beyond.

Hunting is a sport for game, not a game for sport.

Hare-raising idea

Rabbit meat good food for diet conscious

With today's stress on alternative crops for Kentucky farmers, a small marketing cooperative in Western Kentucky may have hit on the idea with applications for other parts of the state.

Raising rabbits.

Yes, that's right. The newly-formed Western Kentucky Rabbit Marketing Co-Op is pushing full-steam ahead promoting the raising and commercial selling of rabbits as an alternate food item.

While the association is less than a year old, the co-op is working hard to develop contracts that could supply rabbit meat throughout the state.

How much supplemental income can be made by raising rabbits?

"You won't pay for the farm," said Mike Bullock, Extension agricultural agent for Caldwell County. "But you can make some nice Christmas money. The first year, you can pay for your cages and other expenses and still make about $30 per rabbit doe."

He added, "And I know one guy who has 150 to 200 does."

BILL WILSON, a member of the co-op who runs a 100-doe operation in Marshall County near Kentucky Lake, estimated that it costs about $1.75 to feed one rabbit to fryer-size of about 2½ pounds. Then he sells the rabbits for about $3 each. Counting other overhead expense, he estimates about a $1 profit per rabbit.

Each doe can have six litters of seven or eight baby rabbits each year, said Bullock, who assisted in setting up the new marketing co-op.

Keith Franklin, owner of Kow Kutter Meat Processing Co. in Princeton and a member of the co-op, slaughters the rabbits now being produced and helps market the frying rabbits, roasters and rabbit sausage.

"Many people don't know that rabbit sausage is available, but it's very good," Franklin said.

Franklin's meat processing plant so far is the only one he knows of in the state that is processing rabbits along with the beef and pork that is the mainstay of his business. In fact, most of the rabbit meat sold in stores in Kentucky is packaged at a commercial plant in Arkansas. He thinks as the co-op expands its marketing program, however, he may be able to devote as much as one day a week to the rabbit operation.

Bullock said the co-op is working to obtain commercial contracts that could require as many of 2,000 rabbits a week within a few months.

THE MAIN problem the new organization faces, according to Stan Bramblett, president of the co-op, is educating the public as to why they should consider eating more rabbit. "We get a lot of questions from people asking how we could eat those cut cute little bunny rabbits," he said. "I just tell them that a baby chick is cute. A baby calf or lamb is cute. Even a baby pig is cute. But we eat those animals."

Another way they are educating the public is by attending events such as the West Kentucky State Fair where they offered barbecued rabbit sandwiches. Many of those who tried the sandwiches like the distinctive flavor and came back for seconds.

Bramblett has about 75 does in his modern operation with a fully-automated feed and watering system. He's been raising rabbits as a hobby for about a year, and has plans for expansion as the market grows.

DIET CONSCIOUS people should be very interested in rabbits as an alternate meat source, he said. A major part of the co-op's educational program is to stress that rabbit meat is very good health food. It is naturally a low-cholesterol meat, and it is high in potassium.

"It is especially good for people with high blood pressure, who often need to reduce their cholesterol levels and increase their potassium intake," he said.
