Health Tips from Lee Rose

The U.S. Consumer Product Safety Commission (CPSC) offers timely safety advice for the use of rattles for babies and children.

Fourteen children in the United States and at least two more in Canada have choked to death on baby rattles. The victims, the oldest of whom was 11 months, either partially swallowed rattles while sucking on them, or fell with rattles in their mouths, causing the rattle to be jammed down their throats. Squeeze toys and teethers have been involved in similar choking incidents. Squeeze toys that were involved in accidents had handles that were small enough to lodge in a baby's throat and obstruct the airway.

An infant's mouth and throat are extremely flexible and can stretch to hold larger shapes than you might not expect. To date, the largest rattle known to have lodged in a baby's mouth/throat had an end 1 5/8 inches in diameter.

CPSC urges you to be particularly cautious when your child has a rattle, squeeze toy or teether:

1. Check for small parts or ends that could extend into the back of the baby's mouth. If you feel that the toy may be too small for safety, throw it away.

2. Take rattles, squeeze toys, teethers and other small objects out of the crib or playpen while the baby is asleep.

3. Check rattles for sturdy construction that will not cause them to break apart while being used.

4. Squeeze toys should not have a squeaker that could become easily detached while being used and result in the baby choking.

5. Teethers should not have rough edges that could cut a baby's lips or gums.
