Reid said that during his first year as principal at NCHS, he never or less followed the same format of running the school system as before him.

"The second year, I have spent mulling and changing to see what benefits the teachers and students would receive," Reid said.

"I have tried to provide a good, well-rounded school system. My philosophy is that happy people are productive people.

"They admit proposals for new ideas, and if I think they are feasible, I do the research and take the ideas before the board of education."

"Without their help, I couldn't have done what I have done," he added.

"Some of the changes in the curriculum that Reid has helped implement are new physics and chemistry programs, additional English classes which include French II, advanced physical education, and the elimination of study halls, which began in 1987-88 school year."

"I feel that eliminating study hall would create a lot of controversy," Reid said.

"The students were not making productive use of their study halls. By eliminating this, other opportunities will be created."

"The students can take a class that is not necessarily here to be offered or mandatory, but one that will provide some type of enrichment."

"For example, a global issues class, in which the students can study current events in social studies."

"I don't want to see students at other school systems in other counties because we don't offer the classes they need," he stressed.

"As far as teachers at NCHS are concerned, Reid tries to stand back and let them do their thing."

"The teachers are here to teach, not to be told down with a million other things to worry about."

"We are here for the students. We shouldn't lose sight of that," Reid concluded.
