Disaster may mean benefits to farmers

Kentucky business closing or work force reductions due to the current drought situation could result in unemployment benefits for affected workers, but probably not for most farm laborers.

Joseph Anderson, director of the state Cabinet for Human Resources Division of Unemployment Insurance, said workers normally covered by U.I. business taxes could receive up to 26 weeks of benefits during a prolonged layoff or a complete closing by their employer.

"The situation would be the same as in the case of a plant that had to shut down due to a parts shortage," Anderson said. "If the water shortage forced the company to close or cut back on its force for several days, those workers affected could be eligible for unemployment benefits."

However, such assistance could not be extended to most farmers and other agriculture workers without a Presidential Disaster Declaration for Kentucky.

"Most farms don't pay unemployment insurance taxes into the system because they have fewer than 10 employees on a regular basis or they don't meet the minimum $20,000 payroll each quarter which would require them to pay into the system," Anderson said. "Because they aren't covered at this time, only a special waiver by the President could extend this assistance to those workers."

Should President Reagan declare a formal disaster designation for Kentucky, agriculture workers could become eligible for unemployment benefits, if the drought cost them their jobs.

Those benefits would be the same as available to any other Kentucky worker, unless an extended drought resulted in a similar extension of the federal U.I. benefits rules.

Kentucky workers who feel they may qualify for drought-related unemployment benefits or who have questions regarding eligibility should contact the nearest office of the Kentucky Department for Employment Services.
