Kentucky jobless rate rises slightly, says state report
Non-ag jobs up, farm jobs down

Non-farm jobs in Kentucky reached a record high in November, but those gains were offset by a drop in agricultural employment at the end of the tobacco harvest season, resulting in a one-tenth of a percent increase in Kentucky's unemployment rate.

Unemployment in the state rose from a revised 7.3 percent in October to a preliminary 7.5 percent in November. That was still well below the 8.3 percent rate recorded in November 1986, according to a report issued today by the Cabinet for Human Resources.

Nationally, November's jobless rate was 8.2 percent, down from October's 8.5 percent. Comparable state and national rates are not seasonally adjusted.

Kentucky's chief labor market analyst, Ed Blackwell, said, "The estimated 1,208,600 non-farm jobs the state recorded for November indicate our economy is manufacturing employment picture for December," he said.

The number of Kentuckians who had jobs as measured by the U.S. Department of Labor's household survey, was 1,556,600 in November, down from 1,573,700 in October and below the November 1986 report of 1,570,600.

The federal estimate that 156,600 Kentuckians were unemployed in November was up from October's report of 119,500, but below the November 1986 figure of 184,100.

"We also see a decline in construction jobs at this time every year because of the anticipated cold temperatures," he said. "But, we expect most workers in both these categories to return to the employment rolls in the spring."

Service jobs decreased by 1,600, mostly in temporary employment agencies, motels and recreation.

Manufacturing jobs were down by 700, but Blackwell said this reflected a strike which idled 1,500 workers at the Henry Yacht Company in Louisville. "These people are back on the job, which should improve our manufacturing employment picture for December," he said.

In November 1988 the state's labor force estimate was 1,708,700. This figure includes non-military people who actively are seeking work. It does not include the unemployed who have not looked for a job in four weeks.

The U.S. Department of Labor estimates the total number of Kentuckians with jobs in this state or commuting to jobs in other states fell from October to November by 174,000. The same estimate shows a 1.310 percent increase in Kentuckians who were employed in November.

The greatest employment growth (1,500) was in trade, including of tobacco sales, Blackwell said. "But department and clothing stores also hired more staff to handle increased holiday gift buying."

Data also was recorded in education (600) and transportation, communications and utilities (300).

Blackwell said most of jobs losses - 14,600 in agriculture and 700 in construction - were temporary.

"The demand for farm workers ebbed and flowed with the tobacco season. We normally see a drop in agricultural employment when tobacco is ready to market."
