Crops may survive

LEXINGTON (AP) – Some have already started to write off the 1988 burley crop, but a tobacco specialist says it's too early for that.

"If you were going to have a drought, this is the time to have it for tobacco, not later," said Gary Palmer, tobacco specialist in the University of Kentucky's College of Agriculture.

He estimated that only 1 percent or 2 percent of the state's tobacco crop has been lost because of the drought.

"Tobacco has a marvelous capacity for recovery," he said. "It even kind of prefers a dry season early."

Others agreed that burley can still make a comeback.

"For the most part, the tobacco looks fairly good right now," said Paul Hall, executive director of the Lincoln County Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service office. "I don't know how it looks as good as it does."

John Wilson, a Madison County extension agent, said tobacco is entering the period where it needs rain the most.

"As we look at it as of right today, if we got rains right on, I think we'd be in good shape," Wilson said. Then he added wistfully, "But of course that's not what's in the forecast."

The National Weather Service said no rain was expected for Kentucky at least through Thursday.

Adair County extension agent Wayne Livesay said about 20 percent of the farmers there had to reset all or part of their tobacco crop. Still, he said, "Our opinion on tobacco is if we get rain, it will still come out and make a fair yield."

Palmer recommended irrigation to people who have the water but said some farmers were holding off because of limited water supply so they would be able to water later in the summer.

Palmer also said cultivating tobacco fields was not a good idea because it could cause some of the moisture in the ground to evaporate. Farmers who do cultivate shouldn't do so deeply, he said.

The condition of the state's tobacco crop in last week's Kentucky Crop Weather report was rated 16 percent very poor, 25 percent poor, 53 percent fair and 6 percent good.
