Extensive community research

Nicholas native studying hometown of Carlisle

A native Nicholas Countian has traveled far and has come back home to perform extensive research for her hometown's benefit.

Ann Kingsolver is combining her great respect for the people of Nicholas County and her extensive travels and experience for education to provide her hometown with something practical for the future.

Kingsolver began her search for higher education after graduating from Nicholas County High School.

She eventually decided on the University of Memphis at Southwestern.

"I chose Southwestern because I was interested in a place scholastically strong and somewhere I could associate with the people and get interested in the community because I am very shy," Kingsolver said.

"While there I majored in both anthropology and sociology and minored in Spanish," she said.

Anthropology is man trying to study other men objectively and the overall study is broken up into four areas, Kingsolver said.

There are four areas of anthropology, Kingsolver said, cultural anthropology or social anthropology is Kingsolver's strong point.

"I also got a chance to get involved in community projects and the university theater," added Kingsolver.

In 1982 she graduated from Southwestern and pursued an honors thesis in Mexico.

"I did research on women in Mexico that crossed the border to work in America.

"They needed a mediator to make sure they received good health care and that they could eventually take care of that aspect of life themselves," said Kingsolver.

Kingsolver's next adventure involved one of her main interests - using cultural anthropology to insure the stability of agricultural life and the communication between the farming community and their needed markets in the city.

"I worked with TAM FARM which is Tennessee Arkansas Mississippi Farmers Association for Retail Marketing.

"Essentially, I made links between inner city people that wanted fresh fruits and vegetables and could not afford them and farmers that needed a sure market.

"This also promoted one of my main interests which was to buy locally," said Kingsolver.

Back in the Southwest Kingsolver worked for the Indian Health Service.

"The Doctors at Southwestern University were doing research on ear diseases and native Americans were having these kinds of health care problems.

"I acted as a mediator so that they could take over," said Kingsolver.

The anthropological student looked up north for her next project.

"I was director for a bio-regional project in cooperation with the Massachusetts Research Institute.

"The Institute is very strong in looking for an alternative for food, housing and shelter with a stressing principle in growing organically and producing locally with what residents have on hand.

"In a particular project I mainly united 15 towns that were having a water problem and helped them to cooperate so they could use the same water source," she said.

While in the northern region, Kingsolver pursued her graduate degree in anthropology.

"Anthropology's main idea is to mediate between ideas and although I knew the practical aspects of the science, I wanted to know how to articulate more clearly.

"This I learned at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst plus environmental studies," said Kingsolver.

She received her master's at the University of Massachusetts in 1984 with funding from the National Science Foundation.

During this time, Kingsolver was interested in development of peoples in Guatemala, Nepal in India and Mexico.

"Although I had not been to some of these places, the people I trained all asked one essential question.

Thai was how can we better our life with what we have on hand.

"And that really makes sense to use what you have got and utilize your assets," said Kingsolver.

For her dissertation (a requirement for a PH.D that involves extensive documented research which is eventually evolved into a book) Kingsolver is using these ideas in her home of Kentucky.

"All the things that I have studied are happening in the present day Kentucky.

'I would like to produce something for all Nicholas Countians to use and refer to.' - Ann Kingsolver

"Industrialization is affecting an agricultural community but the only thing different is that I care personally a great deal and greatly respect this community," said Kingsolver.

"I do center my research around the idea of change but I do disagree that the change is from and agricultural community to industrialization.

"I don't think that this is happening in Kentucky because in reading history and interviewing people I have found that there has always been industries such as ice plants and tanneries and that they have worked with the small farmers to insure a better way of life for everyone," continued Kingsolver.

"I like to look for those subtle changes in tobacco farming and I want to hear what the residents have to say about the good or bad effects of change.

"I do not use anyone's names in documentation and change location to protect our community from unwanted scrutiny because I respect their privacy and value everyones views and opinions as valuable," said Kingsolver.

What will come out of Kingsolver's research, besides her PH.D?

"I would like to produce something for all Nicholas Countians to use and refer to.

"And if nothing else, I would like to talk to people about their views for the future through next December," she said.

"I think that we must accept change in our community but we have to preserve what we already have and finally to utilize what we have at hand because it is to everyone's benefit," she said.

Kingsolver is presently applying for grants for her research and is also substituting in the Nicholas County School System.

"In the future I hope to teach cultural anthropology in a reputable college and consult with other international firms as I have in the past," concluded Kingsolver.

Ann is the daughter of Dr. Wendall and Virginia Kingsolver and the granddaughter of Roy and Louise Kingsolver.

Anyone with questions or information involving Kingsolver's research is invited to call her at 289-5581.
