Legislative Perspective

By Representative Adrian Arnold

Landfills are essential to our society. Kentucky alone generates approximately 14,100 tons of garbage each day and an amount approaching 5,150,000 tons each year.

Landfills cause environmental degradation. There are alternative methods to solid waste disposal but no immediate and realistic replacement management methods are available at this time.

This fall, new and more environmentally sound regulations are scheduled to go into effect mandating states to require local governments and private solid waste operators to comply.

These federal regulations will provide containment standards will include provisions such as minimum national criteria for the location, design, operation, clean-up, and closure of new and existing solid waste landfills.

For example, the operator of a landfill would be required to implement a program to detect and prevent attempts to dispose of regulated quantities of hazardous waste. Also, disposal of liquids is prohibited with some limited exceptions.

Upon closing a landfill, new requirements would necessitate action to minimize the formation and release of leachate (contaminating liquids) and explosive gases to the air, groundwater, or surface water.

A final example is a proposal that landfills be designed with liners, leachate collection systems, and final cover systems sufficient to meet a risk-based goal.

While these standards are admirable in their effort to stabilized the environment, it creates a monumental problem for local governments who are already struggling financially to provide adequate sites to dispose of their community waste.

Continuing loss of revenue from federal sources, in addition to chronic inability to persuade local users to pay their bills, create a gloomy picture for the positive future of environmentally acceptable landfills.

And, in all likelihood, the new federal standards will only cause the local governments, who are struggling valiantly to provide this disposal service, even more financial headaches.

Kentucky is not the only state suffering from these disposal problems.

Everyone, I'm sure, read about the boatload of solid waste from New York City that was sent around the world looking for a disposal site.

The question of the Commonwealth accepting out-of-state waste in local sites is the basis of a current highly volatile controversy among state policymakers.

On the one hand, site operators say they need the money they can secure from highly populated northeastern states whose own sites have been filled and the remaining sites are charging $100 a cubic yard as compared to four to $20 a cubic yard in Kentucky.

Environmentalists, on the other hand, are concerned that if out-of-state waste is accepted, Kentucky will quickly run out of room also.

In addition, accepting waste from other states raises the probability of receiving waste other than household. Most Kentucky landfills are not prepared to safely accept toxic waste for disposal.

But, regardless of the controversy, the federal regulations are reality and legislators ill address the mandate in the 1990 session of the General Assembly.

County government officials have already been urging legislators to allow some sort of mandatory bill collection system such as placing trash pick up costs on the monthly electric bull as many city trash pickup services already to by working with city operated electric companies.

The Waste Management Task Force has been considering legislation that would place a greater emphasis on recycling. Members are also looking at legislation that would amend existing statutes pertaining to local governments' authority to deny certain hazardous waste permit applications.
