Morehead State University has acquired a "laborg" computer to aid visually impaired and other disabled students in coping with modern technology. MSU helping blind and disabled with computers

By Carol H. Bond Of The Carlisle Mercury Staff

Blind and disabled students at Morehead State University now have word processing capabilities, thanks to a special thanks to a special talking computer.

The new equipment was made possible through a joint effort of MSU's Camden-Carroll Library and Academic Services.

The system will give blind students a chance to learn a skill to make writing their papers for class one step easier.

The equipment, located in the Learning Resource Center of the library, became operational in late September. This new addition gives students several directions and instructions by a means of synthesized sound.

To work the computer, a student pushes a button on the keyboard and then hears the letter, command or word typed. The student listens to the computer's verbal response through headphones.

The equipment is available during the regular library hours of Monday-Thursday, 8 a.m. to 5 p.m.; Friday, 8 a.m. to 6 p.m.; Saturday, 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. and Sunday, 2:00 p.m. to 5:00 p.m.

One visually-impaired student has already found the talking computer offers her extra benefits in her education.

The addition of this computer is a great tool to help me succeed in life, said Missy Evans, a senior radio-television major from Mt. Sterling, who is currently setting up training sessions for the visually-impaired.

Debra Reed, counselor at Special Services, and Kathy Wankers, a data specialist II from the Department of Psychology, are currently setting up training sessions for the visually-impaired.
