Wilson remembers first combat experience, well

By Josh Shepherd
The Carlisle Mercury Staff
Every June 6, Charlie Wilson remembers his first combat experience.

He was a member of the Terrible Green Cross, the fourth infantry division, one of the first divisions to see front at Ilo-Ilo on Uyah Beach in Normandy, France during the alliter great hour-D-Day.

Three days after Wilson's 15th birthday when he registered for the draft, he was called to join the war effort in Europe.

He was tested, trained, shipped, fatigued, transported to Boston and loaded on a troop ship bound for England. He was never told where he would be going or what the allies had in mind for his practice.

Wilson was in a trench, and the German snipers still lurking in the buildings and the people being the arduous process of rebuilding, Wilson's division prepared to leave the city and continue the push to Germany through the Siegfried line.
