Pipes delay sewer plant opening

By Josh Shepherd
The Carlisle Mercury

CARLISLE, Mar. 9 — Work on the new sewer plant seemed almost finished until construction workers discovered nearly every pipe joint running through the plant has shown some degree of leakage under pressure, Carlisle Sewer Plant supervisor Gene Kelley said.

A few days before the same plant facilities were scheduled to begin operation the London Bridge Construction company, contracted with the City of Carlisle to build the plant last year, conducted water and air pressure tests on the piping.

However, readings they found after the tests were completed were not what they anticipated, Kelley explained.

Pressure readings fell too fast indicating pipes were leaking, Kelley said. What began as a minor setback, though, became serious as leaks were discovered in almost every joint throughout the entire piping system, he said.

Apparently, Kelley said, the glue and primer used to seal the pipes airtight were not holding under pressure. In some cases the tests they ran caused joints to literally burst open under pressure, he said. The incidences were few, Kelley said, for the most part the pipes have merely leaked.

"Though no pipe itself has burst, all joints have been dismantled and replaced, some as much as five times, with little or no luck at all in getting them to hold," Kelley said.

The biggest concern contractors have with this unforeseen dilemma are the chemical lines, he said. The chlorine and sulfur dioxide lines must be completely sealed to prevent any potential for a serious public hazard to occur, Kelley said.

However, construction workers and ranking officials from London Bridge have exhausted most of their options and the delays are becoming expensive.

With little alternative left to them, London Bridge called in the pipe manufacturers, Corro-Flo, Inc., in order to have their take a look and see if they could pinpoint the problem, Kelley said.

"We're to the point of trying anything right now," Kelley said, "though the glue and primer we used to seal the pipe meet the same specifications as Corro-Flo's, maybe we need to use their products to get the pipe to set right," Kelley said.

The delays are no cost to the City of Carlisle, but the deadline date set up by contract between the City Council and London Bridge stipulated finishing construction by March 1.
