Lyons' writing appeals to all ages

By Judith Howard

The Carlisle Mercury Staff Writer Margaret Lyons would be best known as primarily a children's novelist and her credits attest to the fact her audience encompasses a wide range of ages.

Lyons, who presented her work before a collection of elementary students from third to seventh grades at the Nicholas County Elementary School Friday, began planning for her writing career early, as far back as the second grade.

But unlike those who often change their minds many times about their chosen vocation, Lyons always maintained her interest in the craft.

When she received her doctorate in literature at the University of Indiana, she had already published a body of work, articles and poetry, in a number of periodicals. Her decision to specialize in literature was based more on practical considerations.

Since she had already begun publishing her written work in periodicals, her first personal essay on her love of music in "Singing Out," a folk music magazine, that recently celebrated its 40th anniversary, she felt her studies in literature would aid in making ends meet while alternatively pursuing her writing career.

The degree tag for her writing, she said, wasn't particularly necessary for her to pursue a career in the field. Throughout most of her career the majority of her written work saw periodical publication but it would take while before a body of her work would be actually released in book form.

She submitted her first collection of poems for publication in 1972, but it would not reach a press until 1983. It took her 11 years of constant submission and a resolve not to lose faith in her own work that eventually led to victory.

The year 1983 was a watershed event in her career. It was in that time a small publishing company in Connecticut accepted her poetry collection as many other publishers had turned down.

This first publication of her work was for Lyons, the watershed event in her career. "My later publications met with a bit more attention and a considerably greater number of prints, but that first chapbook of poems, which probably had about a total of 50 printings, told me that someone outside of family and friends liked my work. It is one thing to have support from relations and peers, but to have someone who knows me only through my written work say they like it and want it published, it confirmed to me that I have a chance," Lyons said.

At the same time her original play, "Braids," went into production and debuted in Lexington. Her play met with even greater success. After the run in Lexington, it was picked up for production at the Apple Shop in Eastern Kentucky and she was commissioned to re-work the play for performance on public radio theater.

However publication success often does not mean early financial success. Lyons makes most of her living teaching and participating in special educational projects across Kentucky as well as speaking and writing workshop engagements at universities in Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana, and the nation. Meanwhile her writing continues, she said.

In the works is another play, with musical accompaniment, to be written, cast, and produced. Lyons said she is currently working on a collection of short stories, and a novel. She is also working on a collection of poems, and a play.

5-Year-Old Kentuckian Writes Life Story

This story has many happy endings. That's because 5-year-olds are writing all kinds of stories in Kentucky classrooms where teachers are teaching with IBM's Writing to Read program.

It's a self-paced interactive program that allows young children to write and read at their own pace. The program is designed to help children learn to read and write by using their own lives as a source of material.
