Session an historic event will be allowed during the trial.

Burnette's attorney has already obtained subpoenas for 16 people, including most of the people who testified during Burnette's theft trial in January 1990. That follows Burnette's oft-stated desire to air his case one last time.

But the House, which voted 97-0 to impeach Burnette on Jan. 25, restricted its consideration to the fact of Burnette's conviction at a trial. The only evidence taken by the House Impeachment Committee was the trial record and the Supreme Court opinion that affirmed the conviction.

If that also is the case in the Senate, then there is a possibility that none of the witnesses Burnette has subpoenaed will even be allowed to testify.

And it appears the impeachment trial will not last long. Memoranda prepared by Legislative Research Commission officials said the Senate has scheduled the proceedings on Wednesday and Thursday. Burnette's original trial lasted almost a week.

Work on the solid waste proposal that was the original impetus for Gov. Wallace Wilkinson to call the special session has been moving quite slowly.

Despite weeks of legislative committee hearings before the session began, the first actual vote on a bill was not taken until last week after a nearly all-night session of the Senate Agriculture and Natural Resources Committee. The panel made more than 90 changes to the original bill.

The measure has now gone through two complete revisions and has grown to 119 pages with more amendments expected when the full Senate considers it on Tuesday.

Though not quite as drastic, similar work has been done on a bill to change the way drunken driving laws are enforced.

The bill that emerged from the House Judiciary Committee last week included provisions for rapid revocation of driving privileges and new grounds for finding drunken drivers guilty.

Central to the bill is a legal doctrine called "admin-istrative per se," which al-lows suspension of a driver's license for failing a test for blood alcohol content of 0.10 percent or higher. Another portion, referred to as "illegal per se" makes such readings the legal basis for drunken-driving convictions.

The bill also contains a provision for a "hardship license" that people may use to drive back and forth to work, school or to seek medical care. The license would not be available until after a 30-day suspension.

Despite changes in the committee, another dozen or so amendments are expected to be proposed when the House takes up the DUI bill on Tuesday.
