Swing was king for all ages at old Brair and Rabbit Dance

Remember the National Guard army when it was not old. When the new one upon the hill outside of town was little more than field and grass.
Downtown was not a quaint village, more a Chicago writer before. We were, and still are, a small thriving community with the earth at its roots and special sort of class and dignity bred within its people.

With wife at his arm, remembering with a quiet, silent warmth, how she still looked as beautiful as when he first laid eyes on her, the working man, who farmer and merchant put away his tired work clothes, knotted a tie about his neck, and splashed on a generous portion of the six-year-old cologne kept in the medicine chest for special occasions.

Nicholas to compete in Governors Cup Saturday

For those young people whose idea of a hand is a baring lead guitar, rhythm puitar, bass, synthesizer, and drum set, it may be hard for them to imagine swing.
But before Elvis Presley's pelvis ever made its first suggestive gyrations, before Chuck Berry high adrenaline risk set fire to a six string guitar plugged into an amp, Big Band Swing was king of the neighborhood.

Center Blair, who made who arranged for the big bands that performed once in a while, the class remained.
By the 1950's, though rock and roll was fast becoming the anthem of youth, the big band sound was far from over.
