Carlisle Eye Care Center
Learning Through Seeing

Scientists estimate that over 80 percent of all learning is the result of "seeing".
That's why it's so important to correct visual defects in early childhood and at elementary school age.

Many children don't know that they have visual problems. Often children's eye disorders go undetected through the school years. Parents should seek that children receive a professional eye examination once a year.

The most common vision problems of childhood are:
- Nearsightedness, the inability to see clearly at distances.
- Farsightedness, the inability to see clearly at close range.
- Astigmatism, distorted or blurred vision at either distance or near.
- Perception problems, difficulty in interpreting what is seen.
- Binocular difficulties, the inability to use both eyes together comfortably.

The early detection and correction of visual problems in childhood plays an important role in allowing each child to reach his or her learning potential.
