Amazing electronic technology has made a real difference in the lives of some 40 million Americans—about 10 percent of the population—who have disabilities. There are thousands of specially-designed electronic products that can assist people with special needs, report the members of the Assistive Devices Division (ADD) of the Electronic Industries Association (EIA). Here are just some you may want to know about:

- Speech-to-text—An electronic device that can convert speech into a computer file and vice versa. A user can operate a computer keyboard with an finger, a mouthstick or a headpointer to perform multiple functions.
- Communication board—A device similar to a computer keyboard with buttons or squares featuring pictures or words which an individual can point to or press in order to communicate his or her needs or thoughts to someone else.
- Disability-free—A device that controls other devices. Different...
