INTELLIGENCE AND LEARNING
Current theories of intelligence and learning suggest that intelligence is not a single, fixed capability.

Traditional education has emphasized only two abilities: verbal-linguistic and logical-mathematical. Realistically, student learning is a much more important "intelligence" to our schools.

Research and experience indicate the value of providing a structure for learners to thoughtfully consider what constitutes excellent work and ways to assess their own work.

LEARNING HAS A SOCIAL CONTEXT
Although real life work often requires that people work together to solve problems and create innovations, the majority of the instruction and assessment techniques used in our schools have been independent in nature.

These programs work because they have high expectations for their students, provide an enriching curriculum, and offer support services to students who need them.

Red Ribbon Campaign calling attention to danger

Thanksgiving marks the beginning of the winter holiday season and increased travel on the roads. Taking simple precautions can help prevent drunk driving on the highways.
