SECTION B

New law helps American consumers get information about car parts

UNAPS—American consumers, it's well, have the world's widest choice of new cars and trucks. New, thanks to a new law, American consumers will have simple information about where parts in a vehicle originate and where a vehicle is built. As of October 1, 1994 every car and light truck sold in the U.S. will carry a label that includes: • The U.S. Canadian content of the vehicle's parts, including all material and labor costs. • The top two countries from which 10 percent or more of the vehicle's parts originate outside the U.S. and Canada.

• The country of origin of the engine and transmission; and • Where the vehicle was assembled. The American Automobile Labeling Act of 1992 to stimulate consumer confidence over conflicting claims of domestic content of vehicles sold in this country.

The new label will provide American consumers, for the first time, with simple, yet detailed vehicle content information. This information will be calculated and presented in a uniform fashion by all auto manufacturers because the same rules apply to all automobiles.

According to the U.S. Department of Transportation, the new law is designed to "provide the ultimate purchaser of a new passenger motor vehicle with the best and most understandable information possible about the foreign and U.S./Canada origin of such vehicle."

Who benefits the most from the new law? American consumers. Beginning October 1, they'll have easy access to information they did not have before.
