New Test Detects Dangerous "Minor" Heart Attacks Other Tests Often Miss

(NAPS)—Despite recent advances in treatment, heart disease remains America's leading killer. Now, an advanced diagnostic test makes it possible for doctors to make more lives by identifying even very small heart attacks other tests miss.

Heart pain sends about four million Americans to the hospital for medical attention every year. For 90,000, the hospital stay is brief. For the rest, the heart pain is caused by a condition called angina. Partial blockages in the blood vessels leading to the heart cause chest pain or even "minor" heart attacks as small, but they can be detected by conventional medical tests.

Now, a new test from Beecher Research Corporation, the cardiac T, minimizes the risk of heart damage, provides conclusive proof of minor heart damage that previously went undetected. This is the first diagnostic test for heart attack that measures a truly cardiac-specific protein: cardiac troponin T, which is released only when heart damage occurs.

By identifying those previously undetectable heart attacks, the cardiac T assay gives doctors the information they need to begin treatment aimed at reducing the risk of future heart damage or death. Since the protein detected by
