NOTE: The results on reading, mathematics, science, and social studies are based on the 30/20 as prior as appropriate (common and major) questions in each content area. Results for arts and humanities and practical living/vocational studies are based on 12 domain and performance questions. Results for science and mathematics and practical living/vocational studies were the performance of students on each of the test items on each of these academic areas. Thus, the results shown in these test areas may be slightly different from the results found in the other academic areas.

NOTE: In Curriculum Reports for the five alternative tests, separate scores were computed for common and major tests for each subject. The test scores for students who were not tested for each subject based on both the common and major tests using an approved testing procedure. To ensure a proper comparison with 1994-95 data, scores were recomputed using this procedure for 1992-93 and 1993-94 results. Therefore, 1992-93 and 1993-94 data will differ from previous Curriculum Reports.

About 40 percent of U.S. households contain computers. INAPS - Not one of us is ever completely ready for an emergency. But there are things you can do to be as prepared as possible in the event of an emergency or disaster strike.

Have a quick checklist to make sure you're prepared.

Telephone Directory: Today's telephone directories are more than just place to turn for needed phone numbers. The U.S. WEST Direct Yellow Pages, for example, offers a section on emergency preparedness. It includes information such as tips on how to be prepared for winter storms, severe thunderstorms, floods, house fires, utility problems and more.

Of course, you'll also find emergency telephone numbers. It's a good idea to post this information in various places in the home—the kitchen, master bedroom, garage—virtually anywhere a telephone is located.

First aid kits, every home and car should be equipped with a first aid kit. They can be invaluable in the case of an accident before medical attention is available.

Flashlight: Check to make sure flashlights in your home and car are equipped with working batteries. If the lights go out, or you're stuck by the roadside, lighting is one thing you can depend on.

Emergency Neighbor: Do your children have a place to go in case an emergency occurs and you can't get home? Try to get to know one of your neighbors in a neighborhood where you live. A neighbor who you trust can be a valuable asset should you can be by their side.
