Health officials caution of high heat and humidity

FRANKFORT, Ky. - With rising temperatures and higher humidity settling over the Bluegrass, state health officials are urging Kentuckians to take precautions during hot spells.

The combination of high temperatures and high humidity can be harmful to all persons, even deadly to some people, said Kentucky health Commissioner Rice Leach, M.D.

People most at risk during weather extremes are the elderly who live alone and cannot cool their homes, people with heart or lung problems and those who work or otherwise physically exert themselves outside.

"When the temperatures get above 90 degrees and the humidity is high, everyone needs to be careful because even young and healthy people can suffer heat stroke or heat exhaustion," Leach said.

Leach advises people in high-risk groups to remain inside air-conditioned buildings. People in these groups who cannot cool their homes can go to senior citizen centers, shopping malls, heat respite centers or other air-conditioned places.

During hot spells, neighbors and family members should check on people who may be susceptible to heat-related problems.

People who cool their homes with electric fans should note that if temperatures near the 100-degree mark, fans alone are not enough to cool the body. Health officials recommend using wet washcloths or towels to moisten the skin when using electric fans in very hot weather. Without the application of moisture, fans merely circulate hot air and speed up the body's dehydration process.

Children should take the same precautions as adults as far as outdoor clothing, frequent breaks and plenty of liquids.

"The most important thing about children and hot weather is do not ever leave a child in an automobile, even for a short period of time," Leach said. "Children have died from heat exposure in a hot automobile."

People who must work outside should wear loose, cool clothing, as far as individual jobs allow; take frequent breaks in a cool place; drink plenty of liquids, not including alcoholic beverages. Kentuckians who exercise outside should do so early in the morning during the coolest part of the day.

Remember to take special care of pets during hot spells by giving them fresh, cool water at least twice a day and making sure they have a place out of the sun to rest, and never leave them in a hot, closed-up vehicle, even for a short time.

Symptoms of heat exhaustion are moist, clammy skin, nausea, headache, dizziness or confusion. People with these symptoms should be moved to a cool place and given liquids with small amounts of salt. If a heat exhaustion victim loses consciousness, vomits repeatedly or cannot drink liquids, medical assistance should be called.

In heat stroke, a much more serious ailment that can be fatal, the victim's skin usually is hot and dry to the touch and may appear flushed at first and then turn gray. The person may seem confused or even delirious before losing consciousness.

Heat stroke victims need immediate emergency medical care. In the meantime, by-
