

Sparks is named U.S. National Award winner

The United States Achievement Academy announced today that Amy Sparks has been named a United States National Award winner in English. This award is a prestigious honor very few to excellence and achievement. Sparks, a teacher at George Stearns, in fact, the Academy recognizes less than 10% of all American high school students.

The Academy selects USAA winners upon the exclusive recommendation of teachers, coaches, counselors, and other qualified sponsors and nominators by the Academy. The criteria for Standards of Selection set forth by the Academy. The criteria for selection are a student's academic performance, interest and performance in the United States Achievement Academy, and participation in extracurricular activities.

Many books and articles are available to help you teach your children about money. You can also ask friends, family and neighbors for advice on how to teach your children about money, but the greatest teacher is by example, according to Sue Bales, director of the UK Cooperative Extension Service.

The example we set for our children is powerful. Children observe far more than we ever realize. At the times when we're teaching our children about money management, we must be especially conscious of our own money management practices.

Parents aren't perfect. You won't get it right every time. Everyone at one time or another has given in to the grocery check out line with a credit card or gun just to stop a child's whining or begging. What parent hasn't advanced on an allowance, even if the reason was "work"? Probably your parent has bribed their child to do some household task, and you've overheard on a family conversation about a financial jam? All these examples can start you thinking about your own money management practices and how they might be influencing your children.
