Changes in our Schools

A Commentary

Evidence isn't all in on changing KIRIS

by William H. McCann

There has been much discussion lately about the state's new assessment, known formally as the Kentucky Instructional Results Information System (KIRIS). There has been a move in the current General Assembly to recalculate the baseline of the test. This would delay the distribution of rewards and sanctions, the accountability tools established by education reform. Some legislators propose a cut in the funding for the test and for the rewards.

The issue has never been whether to change KIRIS. Members of the legislature, officials of the Department of Education, educators, parents like those on the Prichard Committee for Academic Excellence, and others have all agreed that it must be improved. The issue is where to make changes and how their timing will effect rewards and sanctions, the consequences attached to school performance.

Last year, through the work of a task force of its members, the Prichard Committee recommended that a regularly-scheduled, research-based review of KIRIS be carried out. We have also recommended changes in KIRIS and in the accountability system that it is supposed to support. Such a review actually started in early 1995—with the studies conducted by the Kentucky Institute for Education Research and the Office of Education Accountability .

The result of this research was legislative action in 1995 requesting that the department of education make adjustments and come back with a report. In other words, the legislature wanted to know: how has KIRIS been changed? What the legislature proposed was a deliberate process, recognizing that there are tough technical issues to be addressed.

We support this deliberate approach, based on real evidence, because assessment and accountability is so important to improving Kentucky schools. Assessment has to be as accurate and credible as possible. It will not be credible to us as concerned parents and citizens until the changes recommended in 1995 are dealt with. Let's see what's been done as a result of all that research and then act on solutions, instead of the other way around.

We have been told that the department of education has been making many of those changes, and that they are being evaluated by national experts on testing. Changes in the test including adding multiple choice questions, reducing the amount of time needed to take the test, and more research on the test's validity were added recently by the state board of education in a new contract with the testing company. We want the reviews by the experts and any others, such as those by the Office of Education Accountability, to be made public so they can be discussed and evaluated.

The changes in KIRIS completed or underway should be examined before legislative action is taken, not afterward. It would be wise and prudent to look at evidence, not hearsay, and then to act accordingly. That was the plan laid out by legislators in 1995, and it should be followed.

As the Prichard Committee examined this issue, we worried deeply about the unforeseen results of changing the rules on teachers in the middle of the game, and about the potential negative impact that actions like those now before the General Assembly would have on school funding, teacher salaries, school councils and school boards, and classroom instruction.

If the evidence and the views of objective researchers show that KIRIS has been changed so it is good enough to measure school progress and determine rewards and sanctions, then proceed. If, on the other hand, the changes aren't good enough—based on objective evidence—then we will be the first to say it's time to go another course.

We emphasize, though, that it isn't likely that Kentucky (or any other state) will come up with a perfect assessment system. Perfection in this new highly technical area isn't possible. We have all been aware of the technical difficulties involved in administering any type of test as indicated by the fact that three tests were adopted and subsequently rejected by Kentuckians in the 1980s.

We recognize and appreciate the concern of the General Assembly on this important question of assessment and accountability. We also recognize that the legislature has the final responsibility and duty to make this decision but for the improvement of education in the Commonwealth. The legislature is the jury, and its decision becomes final. We urge that the decision not be made until all the evidence is before the jury.

How long can we expect to live

LEXINGTON, KY. — George Burns's 100th birthday was front-page news everywhere in the country. And as more of us reach the century mark than ever before in history, researchers on aging, as well as all of us who want to live long, healthy lives, have taken an increasing interest in the limits of the human life span.

There's been a special focus on the baby boomer generation, those born between 1946 and 1960. "The baby boom population will hit 65 around the year 2010, and that will be a massive group," says Graham Rowles, a gerontologist and associate director of the University of Kentucky's Sanders-Brown Center on Aging.

"Knowing how long we are likely to live—our life expectancy—is important in a number of ways," says Rowles. "This information will, for example, influence strategies for combating the diseases of old age, and will also allow us to estimate the future strain on social and medical programs that will be expected to take care of the growing numbers of old people in the U.S."

In taking a long sighted look into the next century, John Thompson, an immunologist in UK's College of Medicine, believes that because a number of diseases that are common now will be under control or eradicated by the mid-21st century, life expectancy will increase "by about 15 years or so."

In contrast to our life expectancy, our life span—how long humans are capable of living—seems to be fixed, Thompson explains. He cites a landmark study published over 35 years ago by anatomy professor Leonard Hayflick, who proved that normal human embryonic cells have a definitive lifespan. Hayflick grew cells in laboratory cultures under the most favorable conditions and found that after 50 doublings of the cells, they aged and died. Thompson says, "It was as if normal cells pollessed a clock that determined how many times they would divide and function."

Giant blow torch

By Monday the result of Saturday night's and Sunday's below freezing weather could be easily seen in the japonica hedge that grows along the Elm Street side of our yard. It looks as if a giant blow torch has been used to turn each blossom to a dull brown.

Spring fire season begins in Kentucky

March marks the start of spring fire season in Kentucky and a change in the hours when a person can legally burn within a set distance from any woodland.

"Spring fire season begins in March and lasts until May 15," said Doug McLaren, Extension Forest Management Specialist with the University of Kentucky College of Agriculture. "During Spring fire season, 4:30 p.m. to midnight is the only time frame a person can legally burn a windfield, trash or any other debris within 150 feet of a forested area."

A person who starts a fire is legally responsible if fire spreads, can be cited for breaking state laws and be liable for the costs of putting the fire out, according to McLaren.

"During spring and fall fire seasons, we have less rainfall, conditions dry out leaf litter on the ground, creating a fuel that will carry fire up into brush and trees in woodlands."

As springtime brings warmer temperatures and more hours of daylight, it is tempting to clear and clean up fields by burning. "When burning near forested areas, don't forget that these areas are an agricultural crop just like hay and beans," McLaren said. "Letting fire escape into woodlands cuts farm profits."

One alternative to burning is to plow crop residue back into the ground. This adds needed nutrients and improve the soil.

"If you do decide to burn a field or other debris, follow some common-sense burning practices to reduce the likelihood of fire escaping," McLaren said. "The most important thing is to wait until after 4:30 p.m. to burn because winds drop down and humidity levels start to increase. Also, when considering the chance fire will escape or spread.

"Rather than burning an entire field or brush pile at one time, break it up into smaller units. It's easier to manage and control if fire happens to escape."

Plow a fire line around the entire area before burning. Stay with the fire until it's completely out. Never leave a fire unattended because environmental conditions can change quickly and cause the fire to spread.

Tips for turkey hunters

The spring turkey season is almost here. Shotgun and archery season opens April 17 and closes after April 30, 1996. Unless exempted, all turkey hunters must possess a valid Kentucky hunting license. The cost is $12.50 for residents, and $95 for nonresidents. Hunters must also have a turkey permit and the cost is $17.50. The spring season limit is two birds with visible beards.

All hunters born on or before January 1, 1975, except those under age 10, shall have completed a state-approved hunter education course and must have a valid course completion card in their possession while hunting. Persons under age 16 must be accompanied by an adult.

There is a new tagging procedure for hunters who take a wild turkey. Immediately after the bird is taken and before the carcass is moved, hunters must cut through or permanently mark the date on the tag. Carcass tags do not have to be attached until the carcass is transported by vehicle or until, for any reason, the hunter is not in direct possession of the harvested bird. At this point a correctly dated tag must be tied on or otherwise attached to the turkey. For complete information, read the 1996 Kentucky Turkey Hunting Guide, available where you buy your license.
