Are all young people in America in trouble? I don't think so. We don't hear about most young people. All we see and hear in the news has to do with young people in trouble.

Is there a serious problem with some young people? Yes! Many of our young people have lost their way. Older generations have failed many of in the younger generation by robbing them of standards and morals that are so crucial to establishing a firm foundation to build on.

We do have problems in our nation with many of children and teenagers. Child abuse, drugs, teen pregnancy, an increase in broken homes, displaced children, abortion, single parent families, and abuse of alcohol among our children and teenagers are all serious problems in our society. Some of the nonsense in the media also undermines the real problems in our country.

Many of our youth, not most, choose to not meet the needs that are neglected in their homes. We have an increase in gangs and gang violence. Because of the need or desire of parents to provide material needs and wants, both parents must work. Out of this situation has developed latch-key kids, children who come home from school to an empty house. Many parents don't know where their children are most of the time.

Some parents, our society, and even our churches, have allowed many of our children and youth to lose their souls for a mess of pottage. Parents have sacrificed many on the altars of convenience, popularity (wanting to be popular with their children), materialism, or just plain neglect. Our society has perpetuated the problem of allowing the culture to deteriorate to the point where our young have few good role models to look up to. I remember a song a few years ago called, "Where have all the flowers gone?" One of the verses ask,"Where have all the heroes gone, gone to grave yards everyone, when will we ever learn, when will we ever learn?" Our churches have failed many because we have allowed few people to take God, or the mention of God, out of their lives. We have not stood together against the onslaught of the religion of humanism blinding our society.

We have been hearing that it takes a village to raise a child. That seems to be the answer from our misguided society. Even a response like, no it takes a family, is not entirely the whole answer. Recently I noticed a book in the Christian bookstore in Fayette Mall entitled, It Takes a Church in a Village. I thought, YES, that is the way it used to be in past generations and the ingredient that's missing today. The church used to be the center of life in a community. That's no longer true, because other things and other places have taken its place. We have lost the center focus in our communities and must somehow recapture it. The church must be the center, not only of the community, but family life as well. God must be the focus in our homes, churches, an communities.

We must support any opportunity to help our children and youth regain their souls, such efforts like "Kafe Carlisle", Boy Scouts, Girl Scouts, etc. It is easy to sit back and criticize, because it takes courage to get involved and make things work. We as a family, church, and community do have a part in helping to save our children and youth. We can't afford to lose one. God loves all of them. He can save them if we will choose to be His instrument. It does take a church in a village to help raise our children. In fact, it must start with the church if it is going to happen. God must be at the center of our reason to save them.

Have you checked your horse's eyes?

Ever notice how if you approach a horse from the front it will sometimes just stand there if it didn't see you, by then if you approach from the side perhaps the slightest movement will make it jump?

Or how an occasional race horse will shy away from a shadow or an unusual pattern on the surface of a race track?

The answer lies in the horse's unique eye structure and placement.

It simply doesn't see the world the way you see it.

Your horse's eyes, for example, are located on opposite sides of its head. This gives your horse super peripheral vision (it really did see you sneaking up from the side) and almost no blind spots. This helped insure that the horse would survive. The horse was the hunted, not the hunter, and its main defense was to flee.

Of all land mammals, the horse has the largest eye, though it may have difficulty focusing on nearby objects. Horses raise and lower their heads to sharpen the image. This is because the cornea is not the same thickness and different areas give different magnifications and focus, much like a pair of bifocal glasses.

They tend to move their heads up and down and from side to side to examine an unfamiliar object. This allows them to see with each eye individually.

Horses may see half again as well as humans at night.

Injuries to the eye, require professional care, the sooner the better.

Fungal keratitis, an infection of the cornea which can be caused by any of several strains of fungus, is becoming more common.

It often follows an injury to the cornea that was improperly treated.

Perhaps the most common disease is uveitis, and inflammation of the tissue that lines the inside of the eye. It can be caused by trauma, parasites, infections and immune-related diseases. It may be linked to leptospirosis.

Recurring uveitis is the most common cause of blindness in horses.

Eyeworms can also infect the eye.

Kentucky is probably the location of choice for treatment of any disease involving a horse because of the high concentration of veterinarians who specialize in equine medicine.

Your veterinarian is the place to begin treatment of an eye condition. He or she is competent to treat any basic problem, and if specialized care is needed can immediately find that care.

Remember that speed of treatment, as well as correctness of treatment, is important with any eye injury.

Cold Comfort For Cancer Patients

(NAPS)—Doctors believe they may have an effective new weapon against cancer of the liver, pancreas, prostate and other deadly forms of the disease. They can now harness the power of sub-zero temperatures in an innovative technique called cryosurgery.

The doctors use hollow steel probes guided by ultrasound to kill tumors. Liquid nitrogen is released through the hollow probes until it reaches a temperature as low as -190° Celsius. Next, heated nitrogen is sent through the probes. Tumors die after being frozen and thawed in two 15-minute cycles, explains Kenneth P. Ramming, M.D., Chief of the Cryosurgery Program at Century City Hospital's Cancer Center in Los Angeles. Dr. Ramming is considered a leader in using cryosurgery to treat cancer patients.

Since January of 1994, more than 100 cryosurgical procedures have been performed at Century City Hospital. In the near future, cryosurgery may also be used on the brain to help treat patients with Parkinson's disease and to treat lung and breast cancers.

Perhaps soon, many cancer patients will be better able to give their condition the cold shoulder.

For more information about cryosurgery, please call 1-800-605-5166 for a free patient packet.
