Relief From Allergies And Hives

CHAPS—Although the fall can be a time of fresh starts and new beginnings for many, it can be far from exciting for the millions of adults and children who suffer from seasonal allergic rhinitis.

More than 50 million Americans fall victims every year to seasonal allergic rhinitis. (1) Estimated 100 million Americans suffer from allergic rhinitis during the warmer months and remain until the first frost. Nasal congestion, along with sneezing, itchy eyes, throat and palate, and headache are the most common symptoms. Thousands also experience chronic hives, an allergic reaction of unknown origin which can last for weeks, or longer.

An estimated 10-20 percent of the population have at least one episode of hives in their lifetime. Although often dismissed as annoyances, allergic rhinitis and chronic hives are aggravated by exposure to allergens and can significantly impact on health, well-being and quality of life. Many with seasonal allergies and hives report that they are forced to limit their daily activities, and others report emotional distress attributed to their symptoms.

While some people tolerate mild cases of seasonal allergies and hives, those with more severe allergic reactions may experience significant symptoms. However, over-the-counter antihistamines and some prescription allergy medications can produce drowsiness. Studies have shown that these sedating antihistamines may impair cognitive functions, including hearing capability, memory and concentration and work performance. Moreover, sedating antihistamines frequently aggravate the symptoms allergy patients present and cause increased risk of occupational injury. Fortunately, there are improved medications available for seasonal allergy and chronic hives. These offer relief without sedation.
