Insect prevention is the best strategy for tobacco growers

Prevention is the key to closing doors to insect problems in tobacco float beds and greenhouses.

"Tobacco growers don't have effective control measures labeled to treat infested sites on prevention in the best strategy," said Lee Townsend, entomologist with the University of Kentucky College of Agriculture.

Remove objects covering the ground, such as plastic around greenhouses or liners for outdoor float beds, wrap lumber and discarded logs," he said. "Moisture collects under these objects, making an excellent habitat and shelter for pillbugs, slugs, millipedes and other scavenger creatures. These pests can damage developing transplants in the coming months."

Growers planning on using the same production location again this year should remove materials that provide desirable habitats for pests so sunlight and wind can help dry out the area.

Apply baits according to label directions to control slugs and millipedes and pillbugs.

"Clean new sites for outdoor float beds now," Townsend said. "Now closely and remove grass and weeds in the area to dry and make potential pest more easy to see and baits as clean-out treatments before putting in plants."

Another good preventative measure is to insect and soil, according to Townsend.

"Identifying a pest problem early allows greenhouse growers to make management decisions before the situation gets out of hand," he said.

"Inspect plants in all sections of the greenhouse or outdoor float beds each week. Examine at least 1 percent of the plants on each monitoring visit to the greenhouse and pay close attention to plants near ventilators, doors and fans."
