Emergency officials prepare Y2K survival kit

Director Gene Kelley of the Carlisle-Nicholas County Emergency Management agency was among over 300 local emergency services leaders and elected officials attending the annual "Governor's Emergency Management Workshop (GEMW)" conducted recently at the Hyatt Regency Hotel in Lexington.

"We were excited about eh turnout this year, particularly by elected officials," said workshop host W. R. Padgett, director of the Kentucky Division of Emergency Management (KyEM). "With so many new hazards challenging us, we desperately need our top officials to be trained and ready to manage community emergencies," said Padgett. Padgett praised the state's Department of Local Government for making GEMW sessions part of a recently created elected official incentive pay training program.

Padgett said sessions on dealing with weapons of mass destruction, or terrorism issues, and the Y2K challenges proved most interesting. "We're calling Y2K an 'event,' not a disaster," said Padgett. "We've asked local elected officials and emergency managers to continue preparing their communities for Y2K, while also working to defuse the needless public panic we're hearing about in some parts of the state."

Other workshop programs included emergency media coordination, search and rescue laws, emergency management legal issues, hazard mitigation projects, damage assessment, emergency operations centers and railroad safety.

Among the noted speakers were Lt. Governor Steve Henry and top policy aide Lacy Suiter of the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

Sut law requires each county to develop a disaster and emergency system of all-hazards emergency management, led by an emergency management director. KY Em is a division of the state's Department of Military Affairs, with headquarters at the Boone National Guard Center in Frankfort.

For information on family disaster plans and Y2K preparedness, citizens may contact the local emergency management agency or the nearest American Red Cross chapter.
