Fences Protect Yards From Hungry Deer

(NAPS)—Increasingly, homeowners are finding that seemingly cute, tame deer aren't all that dear—not with the damage they can do and the disease they may carry. In fact, a few deer can ruin thousands of dollars of landscaping in a short amount of time.

"Most people think deer are only a problem in rural areas, but deer populations are growing in fringe areas like the suburbs because no hunting is allowed there," says Al Benner of Benner's Gardens in New Hope, PA. "Plus all the nice landscaping in the suburbs is like a smorgasbord for deer."

Deer are attracted to a number of different types of plants, such as hostas, azaleas, most vegetables, many evergreens and other varieties, especially tender buds and new shoots.

"Deer are most likely to come into residential areas for food when their own resources are limited, which is at different times throughout the country," explains Benner. "A barrier is the most effective way to prevent them from getting into your yard."

Because deer are able to jump quite high, many typical fences are not built high enough to prevent deer from entering a yard. Several types of special fencing have been developed to deter deer.

One type of deer barrier is a baited electrified fence. This type of system uses bait (often peanut butter) to attract the deer to it. When the deer goes for the bait, it receives a gentle shock and learns not to go near the fence.
