physically injured or killed as a result of the terrorist-related aircraft crashes of Sept. 11, 2001," who decides to opt into the program.

In order to be compensated, claimants will not have to prove that the airlines' or anyone else's negligence contributed to the disaster, as they would in a traditional courtroom. The U.S. Attorney General's office will review claims to determine eligibility and the extent to which the claimant is entitled to damages, including economic (such as lost wages) and noneconomic (losses not easily measured by money, such as loss of a limb or blindness) damages.

The Officers and Executive Committee of ATLA have volunteered to be the first trial lawyers to provide legal services free of charge under this program.

Why would attorneys forgo their fees in this manner? For the same reasons other Americans are pulling together, giving what they can, and offering their patriotism and support: this is one thing trial lawyers can do to help the victims who knew firsthand the awful consequences of Sept. 11, 2001.

Trial lawyers can't stitch together the bodies of the injured. They aren't experts at carefully picking through rubble to rescue survivors. But they can contribute their legal skills, doing what they do for Americans all over this country — making sure people are financially cared for after a tragedy in which they have suffered injury or death of a loved one through no fault of their own.

"Today, we must enter a period of national unity that should set us on a course of comfort, care and respect for the privacy and anguish of the families who have experienced this national tragedy in the most personal of ways," Boyle wrote in a message to ATLA's attorneys that also called for a moratorium on civil lawsuits arising but of these horrible events.

Now should also be a course of renewal and resolve, where American ideals, and the rule of law that terrorists so despise continue as our true guideposts.

And America's trial attorneys are doing what they can to uphold these American ideals.

Antique course to be offered

The opportunity to learn how to tell a fake antique from a real one is being offered by Morehead State University's Office of Continuing Education on Friday and Saturday, Nov. 2 and 3.

An antique appraising course will meet in East Room B of the Adron Dorman University Center from 7 to 9 p.m. on Friday and 9 a.m. to 1 p.m. on Saturday. Instruction, by certified appraiser Steve Kouns, will include researching and purchasing antiques, determining fair value and authentication, auction bidding, negotiating prices, recognizing reproductions, reselling and the current trends collecting.

The workshop has a $40 fee, which includes materials. Preregistration is necessary.

into it and made something. At least the ready-made cookie dough required SOME effort by scooping the dough into the pan. Now you can buy dough cut into slices and pan. Where is the work in that? Product-makers are pondering the public as so many insidious ways, it never rises above the public radar.

believe way-too-convenient products are a big reason why Americans have become fat and lazy. Just wait until sliced peanut butter hits the market.
