Aquatic subgroup named for MSU researcher

A new branch of extinct marine life has an official name and a chapter in the history of life on Earth thanks to the lifelong work of a Morehead State University researcher.

An article in the May 2002 issue of the "Journal of Paleontology" describes a new genus and species or subgroup of shelled aquatic life called Masonoceras, named in honor of Charles E. Mason, MSU associate professor of geoscience. The article was written by Mason's colleagues, David M. Work of the Cincinnati Museum Center and Dr. Walter L. Mason, ammonoid from Arkansas.

"Most times, researchers will have a species named after them, but it's pretty rare to have an entire genus named after you," said Mason. The Masonoceras genus contains several species of ammonoids distinguished by unique features of their shells. Ammonoids are a group of extinct marine creatures with straight or coiled shells, related to the modern-day octopus, squid and chambered nautilus. Their fossilized remains are found in marine rocks around the world dating from more than 400 million years ago to the time that dinosaurs became extinct about 65 million years ago.

Mostly predatorial, these tentacled animals could swim at varying depths and propel themselves by regulating the amount of air in the chambers of their shells.

While members of this new genus have been identified as far away as Australia, the main species has been named Masonoceras kentuckiense, or "Mason's ammonoid from Kentucky."

"I found the first one in Rowan County in the late 1970s while I was working on my master's degree," Mason said. "I've discovered many more in Rowan County along with some in Both County and parts of southern Ohio. Due to the abundance of fossil ammonoids from the Lower Mississippian time period, this area is the best in the world for researching extinct ammonoids of this age interval.

Masonoceras kentuckiense thrived in this region more than 300 million years ago when the area was part of a shallow epicontinental sea, covered by several hundred feet of water. Members of this species were small, never reaching more than three inches in diameter, but some ammonoids grew to be nearly six feet across.

A native of Lewis County, Mason earned a bachelor's degree in biology and geology from MSU and a master's degree in geology from George Washington University. He worked for the U.S. Geological Survey in Washington, D.C., for seven years before joining the University's faculty in 1982.

He has published approximately 50 papers related to his geological and paleontological research and is currently writing several more related to the study of the geologic past of this region of Kentucky.
