TO RIDE BEYOND THE PAINTED STICKS

August 12, 1782, At Vaughn's Ford along the Licking River near Millstown and near the border of present-day Nicholas County.

The 17 horses were nearly dead from physical exertion, and their riders hadn't fared much better from the grueling 35-mile-ride they'd traveled in the last 24 hours.

Captain John Fleming peeled off his saturated hunting shirt as he received an all-clear nod from forward scout Joseph Proctor, who had already crossed the river. Fleming sat down on a log before turning up a bottle of whiskey and drinking greedily from it in several large guzzling swallows.

"It's a trap Captain Holder," he finally said after replacing the cork on the bottle and tossing it to his new best friend, the wiry little Irishman named Michael Cassidy who had just arrived on the frontier after serving with General George Washington. "If we cross that river we'll be riding straight into a trap."

Holder launched into one of his famous cursing rants at Fleming's caution as he implored the men to continue onward.

Fleming bit his tongue. He understood how Holder felt and why he insisted that they continue.

These Native American warriors had abducted two half-brothers; Jones Hoy and Jack Callaway, Aug. 10, from Hoy's Station in present-day Madison County. The warriors then rode northward with their two young captives.

Holder's wife was an older sister to the two brothers and the family continued to lament for another older brother, Micajah Callaway, who had been captured by Shawnee warriors with Daniel Boone and several salt makers at the Lower Blue Licks in Jan. 1778.

Boone and most of the 30 salt makers had returned.

Micajah had not.

It had been rumored that Micajah had "turned full injun" and Micajah was also rumored to have been one of several warriors that had tortured his uncle Col. Richard Callaway to death in March of 1780 when Shawnee warriors killed Callaway and Pemberton Rollins near Fort Boonesboro.

Fleming's own half brother, George Stockton, had been similarly abducted from their Pennsylvania home in 1754 and Stockton lived for a dozen years as a famous Iroquois warrior before returning home and then later coming with Fleming to the Kentucky frontier in 1776.

Fleming thus completely understood Holder's apprehension and he listened to Holder's pleads for a full two minutes before simply mounting his horse, galloping across the river and saying loudly "I can go as far as any man in any fight."

Thomas Jones and Michael Cassidy squatted near the sand bar in the center of the river examining several painted sticks the Native American warriors had left behind. They also saw footprints along the river and knew the two boys had been forced to run the gauntlet. Jones warned the other frontiersmen of the painted sticks.

"They want us to follow Captain!" he said loudly to Holder. "They might be leading us into an ambush. We'd best not ride beyond the painted sticks."

Holder consulted further with Fleming and Capt. John Constant before dividing his force and continuing.

He ordered Cassidy and Constant to take a force of eight men down the Licking River to the mouth of Battle Run Branch while he and Fleming would lead a similar group across the river and, directly after the warriors.

Holder's orders were followed immediately and within only two minutes the cunning Native American trap slammed shut.

Fleming was shot from his horse as he chased a warrior approximately one mile after crossing the river.

Holder saw the swarm of warriors racing toward where Fleming fell and ordered his men to retreat.
