LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Editor:

The Blackberry Festival is a long-standing tradition in Nicholas County. For over 60 years it has been a time to "come home" for those who have moved away and to socialize and renew friendships for all Nicholas Countians. It also gives us, as a community, an opportunity to welcome visitors to share a very special time.

As concerned community organizations, we would like to see that tradition continue and urge those in charge of the festivities to keep them on Main Street in Carlisle. Our historic downtown buildings could no longer contribute to the Festival atmosphere if all or part of it is moved to the outskirts of town.

Watching the street dancing and the parade from a spot on the sidewalk you claimed with your lawn chair would become a thing of the past. We strongly feel it is vital to keep all parts of the Festival downtown and not divided, since a fragmented Festival would be a weakened Festival.

While care should be taken with the use of the courthouse lawn, the property of all of us, we believe the use of the lawn for rides should be continued. Perhaps larger rides could be banned and more emphasis put on rides for younger children and their families, so that all can enjoy this traditional part of the Festival. This would allow carnival rides to continue to be part of the true meaning – community – of the Festival. It would also minimize the damage to the courthouse lawn and danger to the public.

Our organizations are eager to work with all groups in our community, encouraging the traditional, family-oriented activities all have enjoyed for so many years. We should all be reminded that the recent community survey by the Industrial Development Board showed that many of our people feel the festival is a true asset to our town. We urge that this sentiment not be ignored.

Moose on the Loose.

That's the name of a children's book written by Patricia Knaebe of Ft. Wayne, Ind.

Sometimes we are asked to review copies of books and write a little opinion on the book and its impact.

When I realized this was a child's book I went ahead and asked for a review copy. When the book arrived, Marilyn and Evan sat down and Marilyn read the book to him.

I watched as she read it – mainly to see his reaction. He was attentive, but I couldn't gauge exactly how he was accepting the book.

My questioning all came to an end as soon as Marilyn had finished the book.

"Read it again, Mimi," Evan said. From that I was able to draw the proper conclusion.

Every time Evan comes to the house now he wants the book read to him.

Marilyn has read it several times as well as Beth, Carol and Amy.

He loves the book.

And I know why.

It is a book of importance, with an excellent message. In fact, in my mind there are several messages in the book.

It is a book, which shares the important ideas of sharing and smiling and loving and appreciation. These are emotions I believe are being tabled in way too many families.

The book involves the adoption of a dog by a family. It takes several turns, but there is no real drama. It has a great ending and when the book ends it makes those reading and listening feel a little better about life.

You can't always find that in a book, even in a child's book.

The book will be available before long at the Nicholas County Public Library for all to share.

Mrs. Knaebe, an admitted dog lover, said the book is registered with the Library of Congress and can be welcomed into the classrooms or public libraries.

I recommend this book – and so does Evan. And really, that's good enough for me.

Last Saturday was a big day for Marilyn and me.

I went to Papa John's Stadium for the Nicholas County football game against Jeffersontown and Marilyn came down with Beth that same day, as Beth was spending the weekend in Lousiville.

As many of you know I am crazy 99 percent of the time; well okay, 100 percent of the time.

From a geographical perspective we were less than 30 minutes from the Missouri border in far west Illinois.

When we arrived at the restaurant they said it would be a 20 to 25 minute wait. Keep in mind it was 6:15 in Illinois, which operates on central time, but being on eastern time for me it was time to eat.

We didn't sit there for more than five minutes before they called our name. We didn't think it was us, but she motioned for us to come on and we went right to the table.

The food was quick from the kitchen. The sides were ample and the brisket was probably the best I have every eaten. This statement coming from a guy who cooks his own.

We made it back by about 2:30 a.m. Sunday morning. It was a long trip, but the reward was excellent. Mr. Mills owns several restaurants across the country that makes the food the same way, including three in Las Vegas, which means we'll have barbeque when we visit Amy in October.

I know, I know, I am crazy.

That's nothing. The second weekend in September we're going to West Lafayette, Ind., for hamburgers with peanut butter.

And so, for another week, thanks and thirty.

Greetings from Nevada! I hope you are all having a great week.

The babies are getting cuter and cuter every day. I tell you what, spending as much time with them as I have been able to for the past month has been absolutely amazing! I have loved every second of it.

So, I'm working really hard to be a good mom and wife. Since I'm staying home with the babies and Ben is working I have been working extra hard to try and pull my weight around the house.

When I was working, Ben did a lot of the house stuff. He cooked dinner and did the laundry as well as helping with the babies. Now, I'm trying to do it all and let me tell you, it isn't easy.

This week is really the first week I've been able to get a lot of stuff done as last week I was watching an additional child and still trying to adjust to the full time Mommy job I have just taken on.

Monday, I did laundry and cleaned up the kitchen and I made a pork roast for dinner. Of course, I had to call my Mom twice to make sure I was doing it right, but that is ok. Anyway, so I made the pork roast for us to pull it apart and have pulled barbeque pork sandwiches. I made macaroni and cheese as a side dish and a homemade cheesecake for dessert. All was going well until about two minutes before it was finished.

The babies were fussing so I was trying to console them, I was mixing the ingredients into the finished noodles for the macaroni and cheese and heating the barbeque sauce onto the pulled pork. That is when it happened. I smelled something a little funny and heard a sizzle. That is when I noticed the pulled pork was starting to burn.

I honestly don't know how it happened. I didn't have the burner on very high. Thankfully I caught it and dinner wasn't ruined. I would have been really upset if it had been ruined. I had cooked and smelled that pork roast all day. If I hadn't been able to eat it I would have been angry.

Anyway, dinner turned out great!

Not bad for my first hard working day.

The babies were good for me, although they ended up getting on different napping schedules, which was really hard. There wasn't much time at all when one of them wasn't awake which left not much quiet time for me to get some good cleaning done.

It's ok though. I kind of miss them when they are napping anyway. I love holding them and playing with them. I love their smiles.

They are the most precious things ever. But one thing is for certain – driving into Vegas and working was much easier than staying at home! Trust me when I say stay at home mothers work much harder than anyone who works a "real" job.

And they certainly don't get paid enough! Anyway, I'm sure as the time goes on with me at home full time with the babies I will have many more stories to tell. Enjoy Labor Day next week!

Until next week, make it a great one!

War Loving Extremists Go On The Offensive

War lovers have initiated a $15 million campaign on radio and television to try to brainwash you into thinking leaving our troops in Iraq is a good thing to do.

After being treated to a different reason for invading Iraq every few months by Bush and his followers, none of which proved to be true, warmongers are now putting forth one that just plays on emotion.

One of the ploys is to deceive you into thinking the Democrats want to just pull out with no plan. That's a lie. The Democrat withdrawal timetable goes all the way to April of 2008, and there are many "alternative strategies" being put forward.

Only about 20 percent of extremist hardliners in Congress (like Fourth District Congressman Geoff Davis) want to stay. Even powerful Republican Senator Warner, after the latest bleak intelligence report, is calling for a pullout.

Second part of the new campaign to con the American people into thinking we should stay in Iraq is an absurd comparison with Vietnam. Last week President Bush went before the VFW and said we shouldn't have left Vietnam because we could have won that war and that's why we should stay in Iraq.

This is the most ridiculous statement that has come out of Bush's mouth to date. Now he's going to rewrite the history of Vietnam? There are lots of comparisons to be made between Vietnam and Iraq. That is not one of them.

Third deceitful ploy—so transparent that it insults our intelligence: Bush told the VFW he would not leave Iraq until we were "victorious."

"Victorious?" Who are we going to defeat? The warmongers want to deceive you into thinking we are fighting some nation, or some Army. There is nobody powerful Republican Senator Warner, after the latest bleak intelligence report, is calling for a pullout.

And the new buzz word for the $15 million right wing extremist radio and television commercials is: "Tell your congressman we will not surrender."

"Surrender?" To whom? There's no one to declare a military victory over in Iraq and there is no one to surrender to. This is blatant propaganda using buzzwords to deceive you.

Iraq is an all out Civil War with our troops caught in the middle. The different factions only agree on two points. They don't want a democracy and they want U.S. troops out of there.

There are numerous sects, militias, political groups and God-only-knows who else, fighting for power in Iraq. A small group of terrorists are also blowing things up just to keep the pot stirred.

Key word about terrorists: Small. Most of the fighting in Iraq has nothing to do with al-Qaida or any other terrorist organization.

The radio and TV ads also proclaim: "They attacked us." That is an outright lie. Iraq had nothing to do with 9/11.

The Iraqi government must come up with a political solution to the violence, and it is either unable or unwilling to even attempt it. There is no military solution to Iraq's civil war, especially by a foreign invader.

How long can we continue to spend $2 billion a week?

Our infrastructure in America is crumbling. How many more bridges are going to topple because so much of our tax money is going to Iraq? How long are we going to send our children to die or be crippled?

Now the warmongers want to play on your emotions by showing you crippled veterans on television who beg you to write your Congressman and tell him you want the fighting to continue.

The crippled veterans all use one of the new buzzwords that does not apply—"surrender." Think the words came out of their mouths or did they learn a script?

Of course, these young men and women who were maimed in Iraq want to feel that there was a reason for their suffering, but seeing the horror of what happened to them is not reason to stay in Iraq, it is the major reason to get out before any more of our loved ones are killed, crippled or maimed.

Bush is also desperately trying to cook up a plan to keep from telling the truth when General Petraeus makes his recommendations. Petraeus' first appearance before Congress will be September 11. Think that's a coincidence?

Petraeus will jockey and fend before a Congressional committee and then the White House will write Petraeus' promised assessment for him. So much for Democracy.

Don't fall for any of it.

Fourth District Report

Fighting Cancer

4th District Report
By Geoff Davis
4th District Congressman

In 2003, 498 of every 100,000 Kentuckians were diagnosed with cancer. Perhaps even more alarming is the fact that in Kentucky lung and bronchial cancer incidence rates are almost 30% above the national average. Cancer has a tremendous impact on the lives of Kentucky families and our communities. As your representative in Congress, I want you to know that I am working hard to help our fellow Kentuckians who are battling cancer.

Every year, I talk with cancer patients and survivors, their families and caregivers, from home health-care professionals to doctors, during often emotional and yet inspiring visits. I am very proud to be a signatory of the American Cancer Society's Congressional Cancer Pledge for the 110th Congress. This pledge affirms my commitment to support legislation and initiatives that fund cancer research in the hopes of one day finding a cure.

Medical research is critical to the prevention and treatment of cancer. Congress has placed a high priority over the last several years on funding medical research. The federal government will spend more than $5.7 billion this year on cancer research, including $4.7 billion at the National Cancer Institute (NCI). The National Institutes of Health (NIH) and NCI play a critical role in medical research to find cutting-edge treatments and a cure. NIH and NCI sponsored research has resulted in major developments in treating many types of cancer.

In addition to funding cancer research, early detection is essential to proper and effective treatment. Congress recently reauthorized the National Breast and Cervical Cancer Early Detection Program to provide access to critical screening services for underserved women in the U.S. Since 1991, this program has screened more than 2.9 million women, and diagnosed more than 29,000 cases of breast cancer, 94,000 precursor cervical lesions and 1,800 cases of cervical cancer, all of which most likely would have gone undetected until it was too late without this program.

Several years ago, Congress enacted The Women's Health and Cancer Rights Act. The law mandates that insurers that provide benefits for a mastectomy must also provide coverage for reconstructive surgery. Unfortunately, the bill did not require insurance companies to cover a 48-hour hospital stay following a mastectomy. This is why I am a proud co-sponsor of H.R. 119, the Breast Cancer Patient Protection Act of 2007. This bill would prohibit insurers from restricting the length of the post-surgery hospital stay to less than 48 hours. Doctors and their patients should have the final say in how long a patient should be hospitalized following surgery, not insurance companies.

I encourage all of you to get involved in your community as a volunteer to support cancer research. On September 29th, the Cincinnati/Northern Kentucky Chapter of Ovarian Cancer Coalition will hold the Walk for the Whisper at Lunken Play Field. Ovarian cancer is the number one killer of women who experience gynecological cancer, but often the symptoms are overlooked. For more information or to register for the walk, visit: http://www.premierraces.com/Races/Whisper.html. If you need additional information or want to participate in other activities to promote cancer research, I encourage you to contact the American Cancer Society. The ACS maintains a number of offices across the 4th Congressional District that can be found by visiting: www.acs.org.

Senate Week in Review

Senate Week in Review
By R.L. Palmer II
Kentucky Senator District 19

The Kentucky General Assembly met this week and approved economic development legislation that will make Kentucky a national leader in energy policy.

America's dependence on foreign oil has lead state and national leaders to reexamine what natural resources are within America's boundaries that will lead to energy independence.

In order to compete with surrounding states, it was necessary that we pass House Bill 1. energy related companies are interested in locating in Kentucky and the surrounding region because of this area's unique natural resources.

House Bill 1 is a historic environmental, energy, and economic development package for Kentucky. It is intended to take advantage of new energy research and emerging technologies, protect Kentuckians' clean air, and maintain our affordable energy bills.

The incentives in this legislation are designed to attract billion dollar facilities. During the construction and permanent operation, these new facilities will provide thousands of job opportunities. To encourage these companies to employ Kentuckians, the legislation provides additional incentives to companies hiring Kentucky residents.

Because we are all concerned with protecting the environment, this legislation mandates that companies locating in Kentucky conform to federal requirements regarding carbon dioxide emissions and want to restrict the emission CO2.

We have worked very hard to ensure that this is a comprehensive and balanced energy policy. This legislation has a strong agricultural component, which includes incentives for bio-fuels as well as renewable sources of energy.

As inducement for bio-diesel producers and blenders to locate in Kentucky, the bill also raises the cap on the $1-per-gallon tax credit on those fuels to $5 million statewide in 2008 and $10 million in 2009. That's a significant increase from the current $1.5 million annual cap. Cellulosic ethanol producers, who make ethanol fuel from plant waste such as sawdust, paper pulp, switchgrass, and other materials, will also be eligible for the $1-per-gallon credit, up to $5 million annually under a separate program. Producers of "regular" ethanol, derived from corn, soybeans, or wheat, will be give a separate $5 million program.

If we are truly interested, ed in weaning ourselves off foreign oil, however, we must tackle the energy issue from several different angles. Alternative fuels and power sources alone won't totally offset our dependence on foreign energy sources. That's why the bill includes incentives for companies that take significant measurable steps to improve their energy efficiency.

Of course, the public sector must set an example for the private sector in saving energy. The state will incorporate a rating system to design, build, and operate energy-efficient government buildings, and develop a strategy to switch to hybrid and other alternative-fuel vehicles in our state fleet. We'll also study ways to increase our use of biodiesel, ethanol, and other fuels to reduce the state's use of foreign energy.

Since House Bill 1 serves a dual purpose -- creating a comprehensive energy policy as well as spurring economic development -- we wanted to make sure we invested in Kentucky's emerging generation of energy-industry workers. We created a student-loan forgiveness program for students who attend a Kentucky college or university, then work in Kentucky in an energy-related field. We're also directing the state Department of Education to create an energy technology career track program that local school districts can offer to their middle and high school students, and then give them the funding to do it.

Finally, we're increasing our state's direct interest in energy research. We're investing $5 million with the Kentucky Geological Survey to study the potential for oil and gas recovery, as well as coalbed methane recovery using the carbon dioxide produced by the gasification facilities we've already mentioned. We've given $2 million to University of Kentucky's Center for Applied Energy Research to help industry rapidly integrate fresh alternative fuel production technology into their new facilities. Various other grant funds will allow Kentucky-based companies
