Renovation on Johnson Creek Bridge progressing

Second project phase should finish in 2008

The ancient timbers of the Johnson Creek Covered Bridge are receiving vital renovation work. "She's still standing, but you know, she's in pretty poor shape," said master carpenter and bridgewright, Arnold Graton, as he continued to lead the renovation work being done to the historic bridge that straddles Johnson Creek in rural Robertson County. "We're replacing the floorboards, the needle beams and upper chords, and then we'll get the camber back in the bridge. After that, we'll make sure all the braces and counter-braces are good and we'll replace the bad lower chords that need replacing."

The Kentucky Transportation Cabinet has authorized $600,000 for the first phase of the renovation process, which is eventually slated to restore the 110-foot covered bridge to its original rustic charm and beauty.

"I think the overall project will be complete about a year from now," Graton said. Graton is the head of Arnold Graton Associates Inc., of Holderness, N.H. and he will be supervising the renovation to the bridge with David Falletti, who supervises DCF Engineering Inc., of Cary, N.C.

Graton and Falletti have worked together for 30 years and are respected across the nation for the high quality of their work and craftsmanship.

Falletti will join Graton later in the project, and the two communicate regularly as the renovation progresses.

The bridge was built by Jacob Bower, and is typical of the Smith Type IV design, which dates back to the Sideboards have been removed from the Johnson Creek Covered Bridge as renovation continues in an effort to strengthen the deteriorating structure, which was built over 130 years ago.
