Ancient Burying Ground - copied from Collins' History of Kentucky (pp. 653-654). "An ancient burying ground is still observable in Nicholas County, seven miles north of Sharpsburg and five miles south of Upper Blue Licks. The elevation or mound which now (1872) is but little above the surrounding country, embraces nearly an acre. It is covered with fragments of human bones, some of them giant size. A lower jaw bone, exhumed about 1867, with the teeth all perfect, was readily fitted over the jaw of a large man. The thigh bone also, when laid upon the thigh of a man 6 feet tall, projected several inches beyond the cap of the knee. Articles resembling beads have been dug from the mound. Fragments of earthenware are scattered all over it. A black loam of considerable depth covers most of the mound."

"Near the Upper Blue Licks Springs, on top of a barred ridge, is a place over 100 feet square, smoothly paved with very large flat stones. The marks of the tools used in dressing them are still visible. They must have been transported at least a mile as stones of this size are not to be found nearer. It has been suggested the place was prepared for sacrificial purposes or other ceremony, by some race anterior to the Indians of the 18th century."
