Heaven Is A Lot Like Kentucky

When Hell broke loose in Georgia... In northern Georgia, with the First Kentucky Infantry Brigade...

Heaven Is A Lot Like Kentucky By Charles Foster and men of the 6th Kentucky Infantry, under Col. Joseph H. Lewis, and Lt. Col. Martin H. Coffey...

Not far away, their companion Orphans of the 9th Kentucky Infantry, under Col. John W. Caldwell...

There were also two artillery batteries led by Capt. Robert Cobb, the second, formerly known as Graves's Battery...

The men of the 4th called the men in the 5th "Sang-Diggers" because they were composed largely of the mountain boys of what today are known as Morgan, Meigs, Floyd, Pike, Johnson and Floyd, Ky. Johnson...

History would record that it would be they, who had successfully charged through the deftly held Union lines. It had been they, who made that gallant, yet murderous charge, through the Union breast works, into the very mouth of death...

The Orphans faced Union General Thomas Leonidas Crittenden, son of Senator John Crittenden and brother of Confederate General George Crittenden...

very common occurrence among their ranks. Senator Crittenden and his son George supported the Confederacy. Sen. Thomas supported the Union.

There were thousands of Union Kentucky soldiers at Chickamauga that day. Men of the 16th Kentucky under Col. Marion C. Taylor, the 4th Kentucky under Lt. Col. Burgess Hunt and Maj. Robert M. Kelly...

There were also two artillery batteries led by Capt. Robert Cobb, the second, formerly known as Graves's Battery...

The Orphans faced Union General Thomas Leonidas Crittenden, son of Senator John Crittenden and brother of Confederate General George Crittenden...

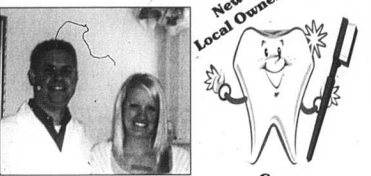

The Orphans understood the Crittenden family dilemma all too well as it was the Union breastworks on the Union left were still holding, and the Orphans were given the order to charge. With fixed bayonets they ran forward...
